They actually were one of the first companies that I noticed creating these works of art. And they have been creating amazing illustrations for their content ever since! Authentic and Genuine Stock Photos As you have probably noticed many brands are creating some very creative designs to seem more genuine. Or to make them feel more authentic, instead of a faceless corporation. This push into the more real and genuine will be seen in the type of stock photos they use this year as well. I feel that a lot of stock photos have become too professional, polished and vague. In their quest to reach as many people as possible, these photographers choose a safe subject. Overly edited photos are also out this year, readers really want more genuine and authentic looking photos of people. The viewer should be able to see themselves reflected in the photo. Kinda like the examples of people below: Source These examples honestly look like they were taken by a bunch of friends hanging out, not by a professional. The same thing can be said about these photos as well! In each of these free stock photos, the colors look real and not like it was overly edited: Almost like something you would see in your Instagram feed from your cousin that travels too much. And I was able to find those examples relatively easy, so it baffles me when brands all use the same generic photo. Those ultra-generic pictures that might relate to the content should be avoided this year. Instead, shoot for photos that help you tell a visual story and add to the narrative. Instead of just filling an open space on your blog or social media feed! For instance, compared to the example above, these photos would work much better in a tech-focused blog article: Like I said previously, these photos depict a real scene that you could put yourself into. Not meticulously planned like some of the examples below: Ugh, that fist bump photo makes me cringe a little bit. Now in my experience, the laziest content creators love the generic and overtly planned stock photos. Ones that took them a few seconds to find, and have already been used by millions of people. I think many of you will agree with that statement. And best of all, you can find these great examples and millions of more stock photos for FREE on Venngage now: Read our step-by-step design guide. Multiple brand color schemes Traditionally, companies have a few colors that they use across all of their branding and design work. This helps people recognize them out in the world, on social media and other places online. In fact, companies rebranding with a plethora of colors schemes is one of the first graphic design trends that I see really taking off. Now they have such a strong visual brand that I know something came from Spotify almost instantly. Usually, a rebranding effort updates the font or graphic of a company logo, but this one was completely different. Instead of changing their logo design , which everyone already knew, they added a ton of new official brand colors to use with it. They built this new branding to show that great things can happen when diverse minds work together. And I hate to say it because some people were not big fans, but I kinda love the rebrand. They already had a logo that everyone knew, but now they have a ton of new ways to use it. When you are a massive company like Dropbox that needs to appeal to almost every industry, this kind of flexibility is ideal. I also think that this change really reflects their growth as a company from a free place to store your school paper, to something that connects the creatives of the world. Just take a look at how they evolved their social media presence from last year: To this year with the rebrand: Who would have thought that breaking design conventions would have allowed for so much creative freedom? However, I do think that this kind of rebrand can only work with a company that is as big and recognizable as Dropbox. In their rebrand, eBay also decided to add a ton of new colors, while keeping their recognizable logo: If we want to compare the two rebrands, I think that eBay would win. Plus, they are using the rebrand across all parts of their platform. The designers at eBay have used the color upgrade to unify millions of products across their site. Take a look at the examples below: They may not all share the same colors, but they have the same feel. Additionally, they have found a way to inject color into a place that is usually boring and bland: This subtle boost of color makes almost everything they share on social media stand out from the rest. Are you seriously going to be able to scroll past this pastel mixer? As kids, we thought this was the best way to make your report on dinosaurs look professional. And I think that we were on to something back then. Because in color gradients will be literally everywhere, from websites to Twitter headers, and even presentations. Instagram , always ahead of the curve, has used it in their branding and logos for the past few years, actually: Now the rest of the world is starting to catch up. As you can see below, they have adopted a gradient as the main background of their site: This is a common way for sites to keep a simple background, and add a few flourishes. This wholehearted adoption of color gradients gives the company a lot of creative freedom, without straying too far from their brand. Because in this case, multiple color gradients is their branding. The graphs and charts are by far my favorite use of color gradients. It adds that little something extra and helps them stand out from the noise. Polaroid , with a more subtle gradient: But my favorite way to use a gradient is by overlaying it on an image or creating a duotone. It adds so much extra power to the image. All this with a simple gradient, a design trick the internet loves to hate. Plus, they can help improve any image or stock photo. This year, I really want you to focus on extending that trend to your social shares as well. Readers and consumers use social media to distract themselves from what is happening in their life. For example, if you were scrolling through your Twitter feed, would you click on the tweet that used this image? Now, technically either would work for the same tweet, but the one from Cubeit is the clear winner. How do I know this? Because that image made me stop in my furious scrolling tracks and want to read the article. I must sound like a broken record by now because of how often I talk about not using bad stock images in your design work. But I also believe that this is one of the easiest ways for your brand to stand out on social media. Your content could be great but it will never get the chance because you picked a bad featured image. They attach a face to almost all of their tweets. Instead of a generic stock photo, you see a friendly and luminizing face, from the person who wrote the article, shining back at you. This is not only a great branding play, it also humanizes the company as a whole. Unconventional colors everywhere As we have seen so far, is the year of taking risks in your design. One of the best places to start taking risks is in the colors that you use. Instead, be ready to inject some more risky colors in your design projects this year. Bold colors are the most common driving force that we have seen behind each of the design trends this year. Instead, I recommend going a little off the rails with the colors you pickâ€"within reason. This way, you can do something new and exciting but still stay close to your core values in other places. They are in an extremely competitive space, fighting with thousands of sports writers for your eyeballs. But they consistently use bold, bright colors in their designs to differentiate their content from those others. Because they do it so well, you can quickly spot a Bleacher Report article or Tweet out in the world. With each issue, they are fighting with thousands of competitors to get the attention readers. With the simple addition an interesting colorâ€"or fiveâ€"they made each graphic much more captivating. You can definitely see this in their color usage lately as well: I have talked a few times before about being to spot something from Spotify just from their non traditional color usage. Another way to add some eye-catching features to your designs is to use some bold or handwritten fonts. This is another trend that seems to come from the design world, moving away from boring minimalism as a whole. Bold and handwritten fonts are going to stand out against the simple or overused fonts that your competitors are using. They are definitely fans of bold fonts, however what they are not fans of is winning apparently. Now, instead of looking at more examples who only use bold or handwritten fonts, I thought it would be interesting to find ones that effortlessly use both. They may actually be my new favorite company in Across their site, they use bold fonts in their graphics or text, which looks great:
