This time, I came across the photos from our trip to Brazil a couple years ago, realizing that I never actually blogged on our experiences there. Well, that is, at least not in the present or past tense. Praia do Pinho What I had NOT expected in response to that post was an admonishing email from a reader who warned me about the covert operations of the nativist movement in Brazil, and offered disquieting news about a particular place in Brazil where he cited a sort of pyramid scheme gone awry that ended in huge monetary losses and even allegations of murder! We already knew you had to be careful about pick-pockets in Rio, but is one really in danger of getting murdered while naked in Brazil? Cabins at Colina do Sol Finally, at the end of and into the beginning of we made it to Brazil, book-ending our trip with requisite visits to Rio de Janeiro and Iguazu Falls, with stops along the way at the nativist beach resort? Praia do Pinho, and finally, the infamous Colina do Sol – yes indeed, the very place the dude had warned me not to visit. We stayed a week at the place. And nobody got murdered! It seems that one nativist entrepreneur named Celso Rossi had acquired a large plot of land in the beautiful green hills above Porto Alegre, then proceeded to lay out the plans for an expansive nativist village with summer homes sheltered in a tropical forest, a man-made lake, a full service restaurant and even a hotel. We spent quite a lot of time with Celso during our visit, who we found to be warm and resoundingly enthusiastic about all things nativism, but spoke candidly about the evolution of this naked utopia in Brazil. Celso, our host At the time of our visit, we stayed in the three story hotel where the top two floors remained unfinished. The lakeside restaurant that had once been the center of social activity had recently closed, and hours on the beach near the lake were decidedly quiet for a summer weekend day, though there were obviously people living in the cabins on the sprawling roads that provided a terrific circuit for morning nativist walks. We were the only guests at the hotel during our stay, and perhaps the first Americans to visit since the whole property management debacle of some years before, so Celso spent many evenings with us, guitar in hand, retelling the dream of his nativist nirvana and his unrelenting passion to see the project move forward, despite the hurdles of the past. At this writing, I think he still lives on the property with his wife, but is no longer involved in the nativist center restaurant and hotel that is rumored to be under new management and poised for a renaissance. The pool – heated by the warm air of Brazil Would we go back? Seeing video footage of the place when it was at its zenith – ten years ago, perhaps – I found myself longing for the vitality of the nativist centers in Europe, thinking this might be a viable winter alternative on this side of the Atlantic. That was not the case during our visit, but as is the case with most nativist places, timing is everything. On patrol at Praia do Pinho Our other nativist stay in Brazil, with its unremarkably modest accommodations, was at Praia do Pinho , about a 90 minute flight south of Rio. I suppose it just depends on what you think a nakation actually is. A walk to the beach As a footnote to our Brazilian experience, with all the fuss about that scantily clad girl from Ipanema, we saw exactly zero naked people or topless women on the mainstream beaches in Brazil. To be sure, the bikini bottoms looked uncomfortably! But suffice it to say, there was nothing on the beaches of Ipanema or Copacabana that would not meet the stringent Facebook rules for public decency – which the seasoned nativist knows to be ridiculously conservative. Like most South American countries, Brazil has its own fair share of prudery that belies the implicit notion that social nudity is really a thing there. A beautiful county worth exploration? A nativist destination for the sake of nakation? Contemplating the story of Colina do Sol.

Praia do Pinho - Naturism in Brazil Naturism in Brazil By the year , Brazil was inhabited by naturists, both in the aspect of being eco-friendly and due to their natural attitude towards nudity. Naturism happened even before the discovery, because the country was inhabited by Indians who were naked and not ashamed of their bodies, since clothes were irrelevant when you looked at the inside of people, respect for nature and enjoyed the quality of life it gave them. The Portuguese colonizers and the church did not respect the way of life, culture and language of indigenous peoples. They dressed and catechized them, and eventually spoiling the influence of Brazilian cultural heritage. Until the Brazilian government promoted this "civilization" of indigenous. Few tribes managed to conserve part of their culture. When speaking of the beginning of naturism in Brazil, it is highlighted as a pioneer the naturist dancer Dora Vivacqua, better known by her stage name Luz Del Fuego, who was a woman ahead of her time who did not fit to any standard and not allow anyone to interfere in your life. She struggled to be authentic, loved animals, nature, and walking around naked. Even misunderstood, she did not stop fighting for her ideals. So, she led the Naturist movement in Brazil. The main purpose was to promote the party nudist ideals. Around the same time she also created a naturist club which she called Ilha do Sol, in the state of Rio de Janeiro, and grew to about two hundred members from around the world. On the island, the nudity was compulsory, with healthy activities like hiking, swimming and sunbathing, the place came to be visited by national and international celebrities. In , Luz Del Fuego also created in Rio de Janeiro "the Brazilian Naturist Club," which was intended to encourage the practice of naturism under strict hygiene and moral principles. When the military took power in the country in , a right-wing government was created, with a total ban on public rights. All political parties were outlawed and public meetings were controlled by the army. The Brazilian Naturist Club continued to exist, but the repression drove their patrons. Over the years, the group that attended the Ilha do Sol was being scattered and few visitors came. Age was advancing and Luz went through many difficulties, and in , died murdered with her home keeper Edgar. With the death of Luz Del Fuego and the harsh repression of the military dictatorship, the naturist movement was losing its strength. In the early 80s there were the first evidence of the practice in Pinho Beach in Santa Catarina. At this time the philosophy was given great prominence in the media and became known for thousands of Brazilians. Today, highly spread, naturism has over 30 affiliated entities with the FBrN - Brazilian Federation of Naturism and already characterized as a mature movement with great growth potential.
