Be the first to leave a comment When you think summer reads, your mind probably falls back to the latest fiction bestseller. After all, we love summer because it allows us to escape from school for a few months. And what better way to escape than with escapist literature. But business and career books of today are not the stodgy exercises in tedium they once were. Some of them are even quite entertaining. Knowing that some of you always have your mind toward the future, we thought now would be a good time to share our picks for the top summer reads for the career-minded students. She talks about the values of getting lost and how that can lead to a more creative and productive you. Manoush Zomorodi investigates cutting-edge research as well as compelling and often funny real-life examples to demonstrate that boredom is actually a crucial tool for making our lives happier, more productive, and more creative. These include the product manager, business development manager, marketing, growth manager, sales, finance, and the search process. When startups first, well, start up, these jobs can be handled by anywhere from one to a few. For those curious and brave enough to take a detour from the more predictable path of corporate life, Entering StartUpLand is a valuable guide to making the leap and understanding how startups work. Be the first to leave a comment The use of social media has risen to, some would say, epidemic proportions. It has taken over our lives, enabled us to make bad decisions, and become a liability in the job search. You want social media to be an extension of the best of you. To help you ensure is a successful year in this regard, we have put together 17 social media resolutions that any career-minded student needs to enact at once if not doing so already. Keep the personal to a minimum. Social media was a tough one to figure out at first. It was not clear how massive it would become and how easy it made connectivity. A connected world is a good thing in many ways, but when you do not know how to reel yourself in, it can be as problematic as it is beneficial. What happened in the beginning – and what still happens way too often today – is that users fail to realize the extent of the personal information they are making available. Everything from political views to vacation plans and embarrassing family dramas play out on sites like Facebook and Twitter with great frequency. Guilty users are essentially creating a backlog of bad behavior that is easy to search and find for a number of employers. Do not air dirty laundry, ever. There is dirty laundry, and there is dirty laundry. One kind of dirty laundry is easy to fix, and there is really no need to discuss it. We are talking, of course, about family or relationship drama. This is your space. Why would you want to bring in or 1, other people you barely know on that stuff, and then create a permanent record that could find its way to that next job opportunity? Dirty laundry, whether you created it or not, can follow you for years and create a chain reaction of personal humiliations that are hard to live down. Learn to be more vanilla. What is the point of being on social media if you have to be plain about everything? We are simply saying you want to do a better job of curating your posts. If you second-guess what you are about to post, as a general rule of thumb, then you probably should not post it. Approach the dilemma from the point of view of an employer. If you do not have a lot of experience with employers, think of someone in a position of authority over you. What would they have to say about the post? Would they think less of you? If it is a negative reaction they give, then you can only assume an employer or potential employer will react the same way. Showcase your best work whenever possible. The further you go into creating a professional-friendly social media profile, the more you will want to be choosy with the things you choose to share as examples of what you can do. We all have work that gives us a feeling of pride and accomplishment, and, conversely, we all have work that we do because we have to do. Sometimes those things can overlap, and if they do, great! All too often, though, we simply do enough to get by so we can move onto things that matter more to us. Those are probably not the types of work examples you should be sharing on social media. But you should share on social media, particularly if you are going to use it to attract employers and provide them with the confidence they are going to need to hire you. Whenever you have a work example that gets praise from a superior or something multiple people have praised you for, boast about it on social media. If it is an article or a special report, for example, you may wish to create a link for it and upload to the website. This will give everyone a sense of your capabilities and competencies. Confine your personal stuff to one account. If you have difficulty keeping your personal life personal, at least take this vital step to protecting yourself from unwanted and unnecessary job-related fallout. You want to use it for professional reasons. But whenever you have the urge to sound off on Donald Trump or Hillary Clinton – whenever you want to launch into a tirade about how your family takes you for granted – whenever you feel compelled to bash an ex – head over to SnapChat instead. Chances are they will not want to go anywhere near it anyway, so it should be easy keeping your profile confined to the right people and out-of-reach from future Mr. If you respect yourself and want to succeed, you owe it to yourself to put that best foot forward. Use social media for outreach, but – Social media can be a great tool for connecting directly with an employer or some stakeholder in the hiring process. As you would with any professional form of communication, do not use shorthand like IMO in my opinion or emojis. This is a professional correspondence, so make sure you have done your homework on the company and the individual. In other words, you may be on Facebook, but you do not need to talk like you are on Facebook. Focus on email for professional purposes. Social media is not the preferred method of reaching out to hiring decision makers. It should be used as a last resort. Whenever you really need to reach out to someone or send in a resume, do email. Now we would go a little further with that recommendation and advise only sending outreach communications to individual people within the organization. It can be a challenge tracking down the personal information needed to do so, but it will greatly enhance your chances of getting a response whenever you decide to go this route. What would you rather do – play the averages and hope that one person responds after emailing 12 resumes in an hour, or spend one hour finding three names and getting a response to all three of your resumes? We would take the latter. Secure all your settings. The only problem with this, is if you are customizing what people see, there will still be vulnerabilities. For example, you could say something off-color that someone forwards along to your employer out of spite. In other words, word can still get around especially if you are behaving like the jackass we are advising you not to be. So why step out of line in the first place, right? To be clear, take both steps. Police your interactions with others and from others. This is one area where bad behavior can sneak through in ways you did not even plan for it to. Your boss or future boss happens to be a staunchly religious sort. You do not think anything of the spirited discussion that ensued, but that is because you expressed who you are and it just comes naturally for you. At the same time you are breathing easy, your boss-figure could be scouring social media for information on you and come across the conversation, which could in turn view how he sees you as a person. Such disagreements and prejudices have been known to cost people jobs, promotions, and even acceptances to certain colleges and universities. Why would I want to work for that guy anyway? To get anywhere in life, you will have to work with and for people you do not see eye-to-eye with. Some you may even hate. Moral of the story: No one cares what you think. Be positive, even when it is difficult. The social media resolutions we are sharing with you here are unusual for most. Many people use their pages as modes of expression that are not altogether healthy. People can bait you with opinions they know to be provocative and unpopular just so they can have the attention of a good argument. The problem is that you are not simply putting that negativity out there for yourself. You are showing it to everyone and creating unnecessary drama for yourself. The remedy to this, of course, is positivity. If you can act and react with positivity, you will present the kind of personality that people – even fake social media people – will want to be around. More importantly, however, you will show that you understand boundaries, and employers will love that. If you cannot be positive, be silent. No one is saying you have to be Polly Perky. Besides people can usually see right through it when you are being disingenuous. The answer to all this – silence. Contrary to what all the social media networks would have you to believe, you do not have to have an opinion on everything. Sometimes staying quiet is the best possible way to present yourself. In the job search context, an employer will make as much note of what is not on your profile as what is. LinkedIn has long been seen by students as a social media box you have to tick. If this is how you view LinkedIn, then you are clearly not getting the most out of it. LinkedIn, like the other social media websites, is good at allowing you to display your credentials and personal information in a way that makes you more attractive to employers. However, it also has a career-related focus that cuts through the ordinary everyday bull and removes the noise that keeps you from connecting to the people that matter. LinkedIn also makes it incredibly easy to go further down a rabbit hole. If you are already connected to one employer, for instance, you can easily see related industries that might make for great job leads further down the road. Review your friends and your history on a regular basis. Some friends are just not worth holding onto, especially if they misuse social media and continually force you to address them. We have had a few real-life friends, who completely abused their privileges on Facebook, forcing our hand to unfriend simply because they could not control their language. When someone uses bad language or inappropriate talk on their own page, there is nothing you can do or really need to. It is not affecting you, after all.
