

1: New York City ready to overhaul approach to marijuana arrests

The New York Terminal Radar Approach Control is located in Westbury, New York, on Long Island. New York TRACON, also known as N90, is a consolidated TRACON, meaning that a single location provides approach service for several large airports.

June 05, , Pretty much all of what Jason said is accurate however, with the wisdom of scanning these frequencies for the past five years I would just like to clarify a few things. First, the relevant frequencies for JFK Approach, starting with the most relevant are On the departure side, As compared to the AirNav listing, To elaborate on the sectorization and frequencies: It is the only frequency which is operational 24 hours a day. It handles all arrivals from all three fixes: When traffic begins to pick up in the morning the workload is gradually divided up. How the approach workload is divided between When traffic becomes too much for 2 controllers to handle, Note that this is only from 1pm-9pm at most. Sometimes it simply subs in for one of the frequencies, taking over all its functions and following the same rules above. Other times it can even become a second "final" sector. In this case The only reason I included If it were up to me, I would dedicate one feed to In fact, my scanner usually stays locked on this frequency. Personally, some of the most exciting scanning is around 11pm and am when this frequency is working everything and there is still a moderate amount of traffic. I suppose the ideal situation would be with 2 sites each with 2 receivers and each receiver dedicated to one frequency: Keep in mind when pairing up frequencies that when not in use the controller is still broadcast on most of these frequencies.
