Never having found a version easy enough for my students but also lovely enough to want to play and work hard on, or even with which to accompany singers, I finally arranged my own version. If kids are somewhat familiar with playing chords in inversions, then they may be ready for this song. O Holy Night has all the chords belonging to its key: I, ii, iii, IV, V and V7 both, and the vi chords. In addition, we will encounter the V7 chord of the iii chord in the chord progression B7 to Em. This is explained as "borrowing" a chord from another key, the key of E minor, to temporarily give us the feeling of being in that minor key. I have them read and play the first left-hand chord, then tell me its name C. Even though it seems like that should be pretty obvious, the doubling of the C at the octave can cause confusion. When I ask them to analyze this chord, I may have to say "Look for the interval of a 4th. They always recognize chords in root position. This slash chord, the F over C, is so beautiful that we usually start over so we can experience it again without hesitation or so much hesitation, at least! Most kids will start immediately to form a G chord, so I give them a warning to read carefully. We do this right over the beat where each chord begins not centered over the measure, which some kids are tempted to do. In the next measure, the hand stays where it is, but changes to a G7 chord. It is pretty easy to read those intervals of 3rds. We count up from the bottom just to confirm that the top note, "f," is indeed 7 steps up from the bass note "g", making it a "seventh chord. Most of my students know that the G7 chord or V7 chord always makes us feel like "going home" to the main chord tonic chord , C. And sure enough, that is just what happens. Sometimes instead of having my students try to play those measures, I say, "Look at my hand. What am I doing? They see right away if they can recognize chord inversions that it is just a C chord inversion, broken, ascending. Then they try it. Measure 45 of the O Holy Night sheet music is a root-position G chord, but the next measure may be harder to decipher for some. It is still a G chord, but it has changed into a G7 chord, with the "f" in the bass and doubled at the top. Where is the "g" of the chord? In the right hand, and I point it out to my students. It goes to a C chord again, only it goes to that part of the C chord which is right next-door to the "f" of the G7 chord; it goes to an "e". Very beautiful voice-leading, or bass voice movement. It is one of the things I have always loved about this song. Later, when they are very familiar with the right hand and putting hands together, I suggest adding extra chord tones to some of the right hand notes. Actually, they are eager to do this themselves, once they understand that the extra notes are just part of the same chord! And that is basically it. Sing this free Christmas song for a church duet. But the harmony part in measure 28 is begging for a bit of drama, so I allow it to break out of the lower notes. Here are the Oh Holy Night lyrics, useful for sing-alongs, or just for saving paper! Here are the links to the lead sheets at the top of the page:
