Linnea Crowther 6 years ago One hundred years ago today, July 14, , a folk music legend was born. His career took him from sea to shining sea, chronicling mid-century America like no other musician before or since. He sang about the Dust Bowl and the Great Depression, the working class and war, the city, the wilderness, and the beauty of the country he called home. He was Woody Guthrie. Though we could easily share facts about Guthrie for his th birthday, we will limit ourselves to just a few. He was named for a president. He traveled with the Okies. A native of Oklahoma, Guthrie saw the beginnings of the Dust Bowl in his home state, and he joined the thousands who migrated to California in search of work. He was a young man, barely out of his teens, and the hard conditions had a strong influence on his later work. He worked with other greats. The group wrote music, lived in socialistic fashion, and hosted "hootenannys" â€” weekly concerts where they shared their music and ideals, as well as collected money for rent. The newspaper was as unconventional as Guthrie was â€” The Daily Worker, newspaper of the Communist party â€” and his column was unusual even for a paper known for bucking tradition. Rather than write about politics and party platform, Guthrie used his "Woody Sez" column to riff on current events in an exaggerated hillbilly dialect. He also drew the occasional cartoon. His first recordings were made for the Library of Congress. The year was and Guthrie had been playing for years, but this was the first time his music was made permanent. In a booklet of lyrics and chords to his early songs, he wrote, "This song is Copyrighted in U. Illness and an accident destroyed his livelihood â€” and his life. Not long after, a campfire accident damaged his arm so badly that he could no longer play guitar. A bright spot in those years was a regular visitor â€” the young folk singer Bob Dylan, who idolized Guthrie and was greatly influenced by him. His musical talent lives on in new generations. Guthrie was the father of eight children, including famous folkie Arlo Guthrie. She performs and records with her husband, Johnny Irion, carrying on the family tradition of playing fine folk music.
