The onset of spring, for many Americans, means just one thing. The start of baseball season. And among those who have loved going out to the old ballgame one can count a number of First Ladies. Just how and when Grace Coolidge began her love of the sport as a spectator is unclear, but by the time her husband was tossing out the first ball of the season for the old Washington, D. Coolidge never played baseball. I know of no sport in which he took part. He did not share my enthusiasm for baseball. Phil Rizzuto gives the elderly Mrs. Coolidge an autograph at the World Series. Boston Globe Contradicting her staid public appearance, Bess Truman had been an active sportswoman as a young girl, winning awards in high school for her physical prowess at tennis, shot-put, track, and basketball. One legendary tale in her family was how, one day, while passing a baseball game where her two younger brothers were playing they needed an extra player. Bess Truman casting her vote for the players she wanted to see in the all-stars game. As First Lady, Bess Truman not only appeared with the President on opening day of the Senators at Griffith Stadium, but also went on her own or with her daughter and friends. When the strictly unpolitical former First Lady was asked to co-chair the reelection campaign of U. Senator Thomas Eagleton, part of her incentive for accepting was the fact that former Cardinals star Stan Musial would serve as her co-chair and she had the chance to talk baseball with him. Nellie Taft and the President at the April 14, game between the Washington Nationals and Philadelphia Phillies when he threw out the first presidential baseball pitch. LC Not long after baseball caught on as the national pastime, several First Ladies showed an interest or support for it. Nellie Taft insisted on joining her husband, President William Howard Taft, when he became the first President to throw out the ball to open the baseball season, on April 14, in a game between the Washington Nationals and the Philadelphia Athletics. Upon their retirement to New Haven, Connecticut, Mrs. Taft often slipped off to watch Yale baseball games on her own, or taking her caramel-colored poodle Caro with her. Florence Harding and the President at a baseball game played by locals in a small Alaska village, LC Florence Harding was also a baseball fan, keeping her own scorecard. While taking a winter sojourn in Augusta, Georgia in she joined her husband to take in a Warren Park exhibition game between the Detroit Tigers and an unspecified Canadian team, but what especially excited the First Lady was the presence there of local resident and baseball legend Ty Cobb. Although details are sketchy, it is believed she returned to see Cobb play there again, the following year, when the presidential party again stopped in Augusta on its way to Florida. Following the sudden death of President Harding in August , the legendary Babe Ruth wrote a heartfelt sympathy letter to the presidential widow. Jacqueline Kennedy never joined her husband when he pitched the ceremonial season opening game, but as a former First Lady, she often took her son, John F. Jackie Kennedy Onassis at the World Series with her husband, daughter and son. Getty Jackie would even return to Shea Stadium with her daughter and second husband, Aristotle Onassis for a World Series game, and all eyes were on her as she explained the finer points of the game to him. A local newspaper would later suggest that Mrs. Onassis be invited to throw out the ceremonial first pitch for the Mets to break a long slump but she was apparently never actually approached to do so. Pat Nixon tosses the ball starting a World Series game, the first First Lady to toss a ceremonial ball. On October 11, Pat. Nixon became the first First Lady to toss out a baseball for a major league team, being at Game Two of the World Series, making her ceremonial first pitch at Baltimore Memorial Stadium. While not as avid as Mrs. Nixon had long loved going to watch baseball games with the stadium crowds, sometimes with her husband or with her daughters, a presence at Griffith Park in the s when she had been serving as Second Lady. It was not until the last months of the Reagan Administration that another First Lady stepped up to the plate, literally. Barbara Bush tossing out the first ball of the new Texas Rangers team, Corbis Six and a half months later, Barbara Bush became the first First Lady to toss a ceremonial first pitch for aa Texas Rangers baseball game, on May 5, Bush tosses another ball, this time at a World Series game. Getty She did so just a month after her son, the future president, became managing general partner of the Texas Rangers and did so as a way to help promote his endeavor. Bush would prove to be a regular at opening games. And she continued her love of baseball well past her White House years, often seen attending games of her local team, the Houston Astros. Her visibility at the nationally-televised event, many discerned, was a boost to the presidential re-election campaign of her son, incumbent president, George W. Clinton Library and Getty On April 4, Hillary Clinton threw out the ceremonial first pitch of the baseball season at a Chicago Cubs game in Wrigley Field; born and raised in the city she was a lifelong fan of the team. Clinton Library Hillary Clinton also proved herself formidable as a player, participating in a White House baseball game informally held for members of the staff, to help kick off the PBS documentary series on baseball. When she began her unprecedented campaign for a U. Senate seat in her adopted state of New York, however, Mrs. Clinton had to split her loyalties with the Chicago Cubs, adopting the Yankees and happy to don one of the team baseball caps. The Alcatraz recreation yard during a game of softball. National Archives and Records Administration On Alcatraz, baseball was popular talk amongst the inmates, but softball is what they played. Inmates were allowed a few hours of yard time on the weekend. Softball was played on a small diamond on the recreation yard. There were no team uniforms, but gloves, bats, and balls were provided. Innings were shorter and balls hit over the wall were considered outs, not home-runs. Inmates organized teams themselves. In there were both four amateur and league teams. Amateurs played a more intramural game and the league teams were more competitive. The amateur teams were named after four minor league squads of the era: Bees, Oaks, Oilers, and Seals. The four league teams bore the names of major league clubs: Cardinals, Cubs, Giants, and Tigers. In later years, the number of teams and style of play changed. Some inmates like bank robber and kidnapper Volney Davis actually played for both amateur and league teams. In , Davis was the Oilers pitching ace. He appeared in 18 games and went His production slipped while on the Cubs though, batting. Perhaps the best batter in the league that year was Lorenzo Murrietta. Murrietta was serving 40 years for assault and theft. His teammate William Lucas was an all around threat. He also had 11 steals and posted an amazing putouts. Murrietta was White, Lucas was Black. Both inmates helped the Cardinals to a . During one game, Volney Davis was involved in a fistfight with another inmate. On May 20, a race riot nearly erupted amid a softball game. A White inmate made derogatory remarks toward a Black inmate. Both men pulled shivs and a fight ensued. Other inmates on the yard brandished weapons and choose sides based on race. The guards were able to quell the commotion and wounds on all sides were superficial. Professional players would occasionally visit the island and this was always popular with the inmates and guards. Warren Spahn and Stan Musial were the most famous players to visit. On October 4, radio jacks were installed in the cells. Inmates were given the day off and able to listen to Game 7 of the World Series on headphones. Cheers echoed throughout the cellhouse as nearly inmates heard the Brooklyn Dodgers shutout the New York Yankees and win their first championship. The World Series proved to be a moment of joy in a place that was supposed to be devoid of it. Baseball allowed inmates to mentally escape their confinement and experience a brief moment of freedom.

However, this sport is not without its own unique risks for injury. During a recent epidemiological study, injury rates from United States High School-level baseball players from the to the athletics seasons for baseball were evaluated. Injury rates stood out for both the shoulder at 1. Saper et al stressed that pitchers were most likely to sustain these injuries noting that pitcher shoulder injuries came in at Medical disqualification from sport can be catastrophic news for someone who identifies with their athletic prowess on the baseball diamond. Saper et al noted that of the aforementioned elbow and shoulder injuries, just shy of twice as many elbows compared to shoulder injuries resulted in the dooming news of medical disqualification for pitchers. This should scream to us, as healthcare providers, that we need to figure out how to better protect our athletes. Thus, a strong jumping off point for our profession may be to first understand what pitch holds the most potential for injury. Luckily, a recent study by Makhni, Lizzio, Meta, Stephens, Okoroha, and Moutzourous looked at the torque applied to the elbow during a pitching sequence of various types of pitches including the fastball, the curveball and the change-up. Their findings suggested the fastball led the way with torque inflicted upon the medial elbow at Just imagine the stresses placed upon the UCL during that single maximum effort fast ball. Then, take into account the pitch counts of these athletes per game, and the various year-round seasons of fall, spring and summer baseball and the perfect storm is quickly forming. Without an intervention under those conditions eventually something will fail. Melugin et al posited some concepts and best practices in injury prevention that can help better protect our pitchers. It was suggested youth pitchers should first learn and obtain consistency in proper fastball mechanics and should not pitch competitively for more than 8 months in a given year. Gabbett added with his suggestion that pitchers receive injury prevention and sport performance benefits from using graded training volume approaches particularly with any activity that includes an external load, such as pitching, as the higher the pitch counts the higher associated rates of injury. Finally, Saper et al after examining the epidemiology of injury for baseball, advised that the best practice in injury prevention would be fatigue limitation and addressing common overuse injury areas in advance. The key takeaway here for ATs seems to be a focus on ensuring mechanics are right and the patient receives adequate rest and recovery. They found that both the beginners and advanced versions of the program resulted in increases of angular torque and impulse control but noted there were no notable increases in strength or endurance about the shoulder. However, Carter et al also noted that there was no notable changes seen when compared with a standardized strength and conditioning protocol in the highly trained population. An important take away from this research appears to suggest that both protocols have a proper place, be it in rehabilitation and return-to-play or in off-season conditioning, as a reference for the ATs and pitching coaches to better prepare their pitchers for the mound.
