Photo by Grabill This volume is devoted to a photographic celebration of the work of two of Shreveport's most important and gifted photographers, father and son, Burch and William Grabill. The staff of the Noel Memorial Library Archives is particularly pleased to be able to gather and bring to the public this trove of historical photographs.

BlockedUnblock FollowFollowing Boston-based photographer. Some photographers are explicit about their purpose and know what they want their images to do. Others find their stories have consequences they did not imagine. I thought it would be interesting and important to look at specific cases where, by design or not, visual stories have made a difference in the world, leaving a legacy of change for the people in the pictures. In this first installment of what will be an ongoing series, I spoke with Altaf Qadri about his story about the School for Less Fortunate , a free school under a Delhi metro bridge for the children of migrants and farmers. Starting with the initial publication in , his photos have spurred both international and local action to support the school and its students. Altaf Qadri, 42, is an Kashmiri photographer based in Delhi, India. After five years with European Pressphoto Agency in Kashmir, he joined the Associated Press as a staff photographer in , eventually relocating to Delhi in But the job does afford Qadri some time to work on stories. And AP has been very helpful in those cases. I asked one of them what they were doing. Qadri waited to meet the teacher, Rajesh Kumar Sharma, and learn about the school. An underprivileged Indian child reads from a black board, painted on a building wall, at a free school run under a metro bridge in New Delhi, India, Wednesday, Nov. For example, [the students] got good mats, school bags, and shoes. The attention has resulted in sustained support for the school beyond the initial waves of donations. He is now running multiples schools around the area where he has convinced the parents of that area to send kids to the school. This way he has some documented proof that he can help their kids. When he first started working on the story, Rajesh Kumar Sharma, the man who runs the school, showed him an old, weathered clipping from a local newspaper in that area of Delhi that had run a story about the school and published a photo. Qadri speaks precisely when he describes his approach to the story. He wanted to focus on the kids and their enthusiasm for studying rather than focus on their poverty. Why would anyone sit on the ground? What I wanted to draw attention to was how keen they are on their education, even in adverse conditions such as that. I think I have been lucky to get that point across. They were published so widely, reaching foreigners, Indian expats living abroad, and the local audience. There was this Indian guy, a businessman who lives in London. He bought some basic stuff, like the mat, the drinking water which was very necessary for the kids new uniforms. This attention draws local volunteers to the school to help however they can. Colorful murals and additional chalkboards were added to the free school under the metro bridge in New Delhi, India. His story has made the school, and especially its founder, well-known in India. He gets invited on radio shows now. Qadri has returned to the school since he first photographed it to see how things have changed. Now they have got four. Qadri recently returned to the school to ask how the school children have done after leaving the School for Less Fortunate.
