List of notable or famous physicians from France, with bios and photos, including the top physicians born in France and even some popular physicians who immigrated to France. If you're trying to find out the names of famous French physicians then this list is the perfect resource for you.

This guide explains what you need for seeing a doctor in France and how to find the best French doctor for your situation. Those who fail to abide by this rule are penalised with higher medical fees and little to no reimbursement for healthcare services from their French health insurance scheme. Until this law kicked in, anyone covered by French social security could go to any French doctor or specialist at any time. The old system had the virtue of simplicity, but encouraged abuse by letting patients consult with several doctors at a time without any coordination of treatment, prescriptions, etc. Primary French doctors are mostly self-employed and work either alone or in group practices. French doctors are not allowed to advertise so it is also helpful to ask your family and friends for recommendations, especially if you prefer English-speaking doctors in France or foreign doctors in France who can speak other languages. You can also find a service that connects you to English-speaking doctors in France if you are a member. In the case of emergencies, you can also visit a hospital emergency department; see a list of main hospitals in Paris and around France. It must be signed by both you and your doctor. Many doctors only fill out the bottom part with their details, in which case you must fill out the top part with your own details; if you have a permanent French social security number include that information in your form, but if you only have a temporary number leave that part blank. You will then need to send everything to your French health insurer. Cost of doctors in France Costs for seeing a doctor in France are always paid upfront, although there may be some exceptions if a patient carries a carte vitale national insurance card. Secteur 1 French doctors charge fixed rates set by social security. Secteur 2 French doctors can charge higher fees but within reason as they are bound by law. Secteur 1 doctors currently charge EUR 23 per consultation but prices may vary slightly for children. These rates can also increase if the patient requests other unrelated medical procedures or if a Secteur 1 doctor in France does a home visit. You can read more about cost of doctors in France. This means your reimbursement payments should equal 70 percent minus EUR 1. Woman pregnant beyond the six month and children under 18 are exempt from this tax. Emergency medicine in France Ambulatory care includes care by general practitioners who are largely self-employed and mostly work alone, although about a third of all GPs work in a group practice. GPs do not exercise gatekeeper functions in the French medical system and people can see any registered medical practitioner of choice including specialists. Thus ambulatory care can take place in many settings. Spending[edit] Total health spending as a percentage of GDP for France compared amongst various other first world nations from to The French healthcare system was named by the World Health Organization in as the best performing system in the world in terms of availability and organization of health care providers. It features a mix of public and private services, relatively high expenditure, high patient success rates and low mortality rates, [15] and high consumer satisfaction. The study noted considerable difficulties in cross border comparison of medication use. Reasons for this may be because they prefer to specialize and get jobs at hospitals rather than setting up General Practices. The workload for general practice doctors requires more hours and responsibility than workplace and supply doctors. In a comparison of health care funding, institutions and level of resources between countries, prevention of long waiting lists in France was attributed to a high number of doctors and hospital beds, combined with fee-for-service funding of doctors and private hospitals. In France, many specialists treat patients outside hospitals; these ambulatory specialists are paid fee-for-service. Private hospitals were also paid by diem daily rates and fee-for-service in , and provided much of total surgery. Fee-for-service rather than limited budgets, with access for patients with public health insurance helped prevent long waits for surgery Siciliani and Hurst, , pp. Long waits apparently remain unusual. However, some moderate waits have developed. French patients were relatively unlikely to report forgoing care because of waits Eurostat, This percentage held relatively constant over time, showing that waiting lists in France for appointments and elective surgery are not a new phenomenon. This study has limitations. The number of people surveyed may not have been perfectly representative, although the figures held similar over time. The waits were self-reported, rather than collected from statistics; this may also lead the data to be not completely representative. This suggests that while French patients in some cases have similar to current waiting times to the first 3 countries, the number of patients who receive appointments and treatment is significantly higher than in the U. Thus, while waiting times in the U. One study reported longer waiting times for uninsured American patients, who may face a disproportionate number of longer waiting times citation needed founder Alejandro Castillo.

The American health care system ranked 37th. In , France spent Again, in , the last year for which figures are available, the per capita total expenditure on health in U. Analyzing the French system might provide some ideas for a solution to the current health care crisis in America. We need to start with an understanding of how the French system works. France does not have socialized medicine. Socialized medicine is a system where all physicians and medical personnel are employed by the government and medical care is free. In such a system, health insurance does not exist because it is not necessary. Communist countries have socialized medicine and in the United States such a system exists on a limited scale for the military and for veterans. The main difference between the French and the American health care systems is not in the way medical care is delivered. Both systems are actually fairly similar in this regard. Most physicians in France are independent providers who have a private practice like here. Pharmacies in France are private businesses like here. The main difference lies in the way the financing of the system is structured. France has a non-profit national health insurance system administered by the Social Security administration with mandatory coverage for anyone who resides for more than 3 months in the country. Health care insurance is not directly managed by the government but by an autonomous authority made up of representatives of employers, unions and the government. It is in many ways analogous to how Medicare is funded and managed in the United States. The system is financed mainly by mandatory contributions by employers and employees, or on taxable income for non-salaried persons. Contributions are a percentage of income, not a flat amount. This makes universal coverage feasible because nobody is in a position where they cannot afford health insurance. Currently, employers pay Employees pay a Social Security tax of 7. If you go to France, you cannot obtain a residence permit without first showing that you have registered for national health insurance. The Social Security administration negotiates all medical fees with national unions and organizations of medical providers. The vast majority of physicians agree to follow the Social Security fee scale: If these physicians under contract charge in excess of the established fee schedule, they must return the excess income to Social Security. A small number of physicians do not accept the Social Security fee scale and set their own fees. They see a small clientele of wealthy patients. Health care fees for similar services offered by similar categories of physicians in the same area of France are the same. Competition does exist among physicians and among hospitals, but it is about the quality of medical care, not its price. Unlike people stuck in a mandated provider network in the U. In this way, France is like a gigantic preferred provider network under contract with a single insurer. Medical schools in France are public institutions and are almost tuition-free. As a result, physicians do not have to pay back huge student loans. Most people have private insurance coverage for these non-covered balances, usually through unions or non-profit insurance companies where the insurance premiums are highly regulated. It works much the same way if one is hospitalized: Prescription drug prices are controlled by the Social Security administration. French law bans all health care advertising to the general public. Drug companies may promote new products only to physicians, not patients. Surveys show that the French are generally satisfied with their health care system. It combines universal access to care with a high degree of freedom for patients. While it is not perfect, it provides a model worth emulating.
