More than 15 years after launching "America's Army," a first-person shooter game aimed at enlisting real world soldiers, the Army is calling for active duty troops and reservists to compete.

Ibori and Sam Amuka at the funeral The man they had come to commiserate with, Chief James Onanefe Ibori, whose late elder brother, William, was lying in state there, had been moving from one point to the other playing the perfect host, thanking and welcoming guests. A slight hush descended as people craned their necks to espy who was making that grand entrance. The discussion at my table stopped. I was poised to jot down the name that I expected to be announced soon. Then the Master of Ceremonies, also bellowed the information, doing a lengthy, theatrically enchanting dramatic monologue. Areh was once a journalist in the Vanguard stable, which Uncle Sam birthed and shepherded into prominence, but he had left that organisation for over ten years now. Still, he saw Uncle Sam as his boss and respected him as such. Areh left his seat, another journalist, Mr. Ted Iwere, had stood up to receive a hand shake from Uncle Sam, then he positioned a seat for that uncle figure of Nigerian journalism, who now sat a seat or two to Mr. Chief Ibori, whose chair was to Mr. He motioned that a seat be brought to him there. Though the seat materialised immediately, he still kept standing for some minutes as he laughed and chatted with the Vanguard publisher. I understood the message in that non-verbal communication. Ibori, the to Governor of Delta state, the strong man of South-South politics, not just of Delta state, and one of the real irokos of Nigerian political affairs was exhibiting his respect for Uncle Sam. He remained close to Uncle Sam. I had practiced a hundred times before how I would knock on his office, introduce myself and thank him for the trust he has reposed on me; a total stranger. So, would it not be out of place to introduce myself to him at a public gathering? I ambled towards him, bent low and I mentioned my name. A smile lit up his face, his very eyes sparkled, not that he was excited at a nobody like me but just out of his kindliness and genuine warmth towards others, and he exclaimed: I explained that I actually came up to him to thank him for trusting me. That was the third time he was saying that to me. The other times were on the phone. I had phoned him to ask for special concession, that I had an advert to place for my principal and Uncle Sam cut me short: Whenever you have an advert, just send it in and say the date you want it published. It will be done. When I later phoned to thank him for that concession and to inform him that I had paid for the advert, Uncle Sam again replied: Emmanuel Uduaghan or Senator James Manager " two persons who are contesting for the same Senate seat Delta South and yet flanked Ibori left and right for a photograph that day. We were all proud that Uncle Sam was the centre of attraction. I read Uncle Sam for the first time, as a school boy, in when I was on long vacation in Lagos; he wrote the Sad Sam column then in the Sunday Punch, which he helped co- found with his friend the late Chief James Aboderin. Instead of cursing the darkness, he chose to light a candle called the Vanguard. Before then, he had been Editor at the Daily Times. Vanguard is one newspaper company where editors and reporters find a home for decades at a stretch " shielded from the dislocations and career-truncations prevalent in Nigerian journalism. Fayose bids Ekiti farewell, moves out of state capital I was told that he never allows articles on him published in Vanguard. He is a different publisher. I doubt if he would have agreed if he allowed me complete the message, that the piece I intended to write would be on him. I hope I have not offended you.
