Poetry Lovers' Page is going through renovation. Please stay tuned for new and exciting features.

During his boyhood, he spent holidays with his maternal grandfather, a minister and professor of moral philosophy who shared his love of sermons and storytelling with him. Prone to illness, Stevenson spent many of his early winters in bed, entertained only by his imagination and a great love of reading, especially William Shakespeare, Sir Walter Scott, John Bunyan and The Arabian Nights. Encouraged to follow the family tradition of lighthouse engineering, he began studies at the University of Edinburgh in 1875, but quickly discovered he preferred a career in literature. To satisfy his father, he acquired a law degree and was admitted to the bar by the time he was twenty-five. Stevenson spent the next four years traveling through Europe, mostly around Paris, publishing essays and articles about his travels. In 1880, he met Fanny Vandegrift Osbourne, a married woman ten years his elder. When she decided to return to San Francisco soon after they met, Stevenson followed, taking the long voyage across the Atlantic and across the United States against the advice of his friends and physician. To add to his adventure and inform his writing, he chose to travel in steerage and was near death when he arrived in Monterey, California, in 1881. After being nursed back to health, he continued to San Francisco that winter, though it cost him his health. Osbourne, who had since been divorced, helped him recover. They married the following May. After several months in the U.S., frequently sick, he continued to write seriously, producing the bulk of his best-loved work. A representative of Neo-romanticism during the Modernist period of English literature, Stevenson was an incredibly popular and successful writer. He was also friends with Henry James, who was a vocal supporter of his work. Following the death of his father in 1885, Stevenson left again for the U.S. Upon landing in New York, however, they decided to spend the winter at Saranac Lake, in the Adirondacks. That summer he chartered a yacht and sailed through eastern and central Pacific, stopping for extended stays among the Hawaiian Islands. In 1889, Stevenson purchased a four hundred-acre estate in Upolu, one of the Samoan islands. He adopted the native name Tūsitāla Samoa for "Story Writer" and soon became immersed in local politics. By 1893, Stevenson had become increasingly depressed, convinced the best of his work was behind him. He wrote that he wished his illnesses would kill him. On the evening of December 3, 1893, he collapsed, possibly due to a cerebral hemorrhage, and died. He is entombed at Mt. Vaea, at a spot overlooking the sea, with a tablet on which his poem "Requiem" is inscribed. For most of the 20th century he was excluded from the Oxford and Norton anthologies of literature entirely, though he is now included.

*Envoy for A Child's Garden of Verses
Whether upon the garden seat
You lounge with your uplifted feet
Under the May's whole Heaven of blue;
Or whether on the sofa you,
No grown up person being by,
Do some soft corner occupy;
Take you this volume in your hands
And enter into other lands,
For lo!*
