If conditions are too rough at the chosen entrance, consider skirting the breakwater and entering from the opposite side. Transient dockage, moorings and fuel are available at the marinas on the west bank of the salt pond see below. Be careful to stay inside the channel, which is bordered by a shallow sandflat on the east side. The channel has a mean low depth of 9 feet. If you wish to proceed farther north into the pond, continue to follow the channel markers. Unless your boat has a shallow draft, pay close attention, as the channel is narrow and winding. Be aware that Galilee, on the east side of the lower pond, is a working port, home to hundreds of commercial vessels, from inshore lobsterboats to mammoth offshore draggers. A free town ramp with float and parking across the street is located in Wakefield, on the Upper Pond. There is plenty of good holding ground and deep water feet inside the Harbor of Refuge. Just be sure to anchor outside the main channels. You can usually find good protection here in any wind, but be aware that wakes from the numerous commercial vessels and larger sportfishing boats can make for a roly experience, especially early in the morning. Good anchorages for smaller vessels can be found inside Point Judith Pond. A popular transient anchorage exists north of Plato Island, and is marked by white floats. At dead low tide the water is only four feet deep between the channel and the seven-foot anchorage, so deeper-draft boats should run north of the islands and cut into the anchorage between Gardner and Beach Islands.
