Environmental psychology overlaps with many other established design disciplines, including space planning, ergonomics, lighting, acoustics, way-finding, branding, and interior design. And while its scope is enormous, its methods and conclusions are astonishingly precise. For example, research has proven that locating a sink within the visible stretch of a hospital corridor can increase the rate of hand washing, and that installing operable windows in a school classroom can reduce sleepiness. It investigates the effects of a certain color of paint on a living room wall and also of the ideal ratio of planted to paved space in a city park. Environmental psychology is akin to evidence-based design, which architects tend to be more familiar. Evidence-based design draws upon knowledge from all fields, culling any type of information that has been scientifically proven and can be reproduced. Sustainable design is largely evidence-based, as its practices and regulations are based on scientific research. Not all the subjects that environmental psychologists tackle are obvious and easily observable. And, at the other end of the spectrum, there are psychologists who study more broad-based social and cultural responses. For commercial projects, this can lead to improvements in employee productivity. For retail projects, environmental psychology might mean higher sales. In a healthcare environment, this could mean accelerating patient recovery times. Right now, environmental psychologists are most likely to be called in to advise architects on very specific project types, typically in healthcare. Environmental psychologists might be retained on staff at a large design firm, or serve as consultants on a per-project basis at smaller ones. Meadowlark Hills, a retirement community in Manhattan, Kan. Individual doors designate individual entries into separate households, each door providing a physical manifestation of the act of entry into the home. Environmental psychologist and interior designer Migette Kaup, who consulted on a nursing home renovation of Meadowlark Hills, a retirement community in Manhattan, Kan. When we are attempting to shift social meanings and create new experiences, such as making a nursing home actually feel residential, this reinforcement can be central to achieving the stated programmatic goals. For a New York City preschool, Kopec worked with designer Zvia Dover to incorporate mezzanine play areas, low ceilings, and vision panels to break a large loft space into smaller, more protected, interconnected ones, which can provide a greater sense of security for anxious children. Data, design, or both?
