They can transfer or discharge residents from the home only for certain reasons and, even then, only when they follow specified procedures. There are several reasons why a nursing home may try to evict a resident. Because Medicaid and Medicare typically pay much lower rates than homes receive from their private pay clients, facilities may try to limit the size of their Medicaid-covered populations. Residents judged by the home to be "difficult" may become a target for eviction or transfer--often to a less appealing nursing home or to a psychiatric hospital. For a nursing home resident, few events are as traumatic as an involuntary transfer or discharge. At best, such occurrences are stressful and disruptive. At worst, "transfer trauma" will leave a frail elderly person frightened, disoriented, and isolated from friends and families, causing irreparable psychological and physical harm. The transfers and discharges discussed here include any time the home moves a resident outside of that facility, including transfers to a hospital. There are separate rules and procedures for transfers from one room to another room within the same nursing home. When can a nursing home resident be transferred or discharged? A resident can never be discharged or transferred if moving the resident is "medically contraindicated," i. If the transfer or discharge will not be harmful, a nursing home can only require a resident to leave in five situations: Medical care the resident requires can not be provided in a nursing home setting. The need for particular types of medical care or for extensive care should seldom be the basis for a transfer. Staffing levels should never be a factor. Nursing homes are always required to adjust the staffing levels of nurses, therapists and aides as needed to provide the best care possible for all residents. The health or safety of other individuals in the home is endangered. In the case of a self-pay patient, the resident has not paid for care at least fifteen days. The home plans to cease operations. In this situation, the home must continue to provide care and accept payment from Medicaid for all those in residence when the home decided to withdraw from the Medicaid program. What is the procedure for proposed transfers or discharges? Usually, a nursing facility must give you, your guardian, conservator or legally liable relative a written notice, at least 30 days, and no more than 60 days, before a transfer or discharge from one facility to another. A shorter notice is allowed in emergency situations or for residents recently admitted. The nursing home must comply with all of the following notice requirements even if the home claims that the resident "consented" to the transfer or discharge. The notice must include: The date given must be at least twenty days from your receipt of the notice from the facility. Should the facility prepare a discharge plan for me? The discharge plan must: Consider the possibility of placement near your relatives, spouse, guardian or conservator. Include a written evaluation of the effects of the transfer or discharge on you and a statement of how the nursing facility will make the transfer or discharge less disturbing. Outline the care and kinds of services which you will receive upon transfer or discharge. Except in an emergency, the nursing facility must give you, your doctor, guardian, conservator or legally liable relative, a copy of the discharge plan at least 30 days prior to the transfer or discharge. Can a transfer or discharge be appealed? The resident always has the right to appeal a discharge or transfer. If you receive notice of a proposed transfer or discharge, it is important to start the appeal within 20 days of your receipt of a transfer or discharge notice. If you file an appeal during this day period, you cannot be moved until a hearing is held and a written decision is issued. An appeal, however, can be filed within 60 days of receipt of the transfer or discharge notice. Legal services organizations and the long-term care ombudsman can provide assistance with transfers and discharges. Facilities that attempt to transfer residents in violation of the law or without providing them with the required advance written notice can be sued. The courts are authorized to issue injunctions to prevent transfers, to order facilities to reverse transfer, and to make nursing homes pay residents compensatory and punitive damages. Residents may also file complaints with the Connecticut Department of Public Health against nursing homes and nursing home administrators that violate these rights. What are the laws on transfers, discharges and discharge planning? The following laws apply to every nursing home in Connecticut: Discrimination against complainants and others prohibited.
