History[ edit ] The Puerto Rican community in Chicago has a history that stretches back more than 70 years. The first Puerto Rican migration in the s to Chicago was not from the island itself but from New York City , and many settled on State Street just south of the downtown hotels. Only a small number of people joined this migration. The first large wave of migration to Chicago came in the late s, where many settled in the "La Clark" neighborhood around Dearborn, La Salle and Clark Street just north of downtown. Starting in , many people were recruited by Castle Barton Associates and other companies as low-wage, non-union foundry workers and domestic workers in hotels and private homes. As soon as they were established in Chicago, many were joined by their spouses and families. They first moved into nearby Lincoln Park just over the Chicago River. The Puerto Rican community then moved north and west. Puerto Ricans living in Wicker Park and Lincoln were really one large neighborhood that became divided when the Kennedy Expressway was built in the early s. The events of June 12 through 14, , the Division Street riots , constituted the first major Puerto Rican urban rebellion in Chicago. The uprising took place about the time that the Chicago Police Department began taking "precautionary measures" to head off potential unrest of the type that had already occurred in African-American centers such as Harlem , Watts and North Philadelphia. The Puerto Rican community is establishing itself and becoming more active politically. According to the census, those of full or partial Puerto Rican descent totaled , or 3. July Main article: Paseo Boricua is microcosm of the Puerto Rican community. Flanking this very flavorful strip on both sides are these fifty-nine feet tall Puerto Rican flags made of steel , 2 gateways that are the bookends of Paseo Boricua. This street is dedicated to Puerto Rican pride including a walk of fame with the names of many outstanding Puerto Ricans. The Humboldt Park Paseo Boricua neighborhood is the flagship of all Puerto Rican enclaves This neighborhood is the political and cultural capital of the Puerto Rican community in the Midwest. Over time, Paseo Boricua became a place where Puerto Ricans could go to learn about their heritage. A culture center was established, and the offices of local Puerto Rican politicians relocated their offices to Division Street. The area is visually stunning, having many colorful and historically important murals as well as two affordable housing buildings with facades and colors mimicking the Spanish colonial styles of Old San Juan. Now in its 48th year, the six-day festival in Humboldt Park has become the largest attended Latino festival in the city of Chicago and in the Mid-West. Producing Masculinidad wrote that the school "is strongly associated with Puerto Rican cultural nationalism". Ramos-Zayas, author of National Performances:
