Free Pronunciation Activity for this Video 5. Dramatic Song This song makes fun of the fact that pop music is about nothing. This song will teach you the value of understanding what song lyrics are saying! And the song might hit the charts in her country if parts sounded like Cooldplaaayyy. If the chorus sounds like coollldplaaayyy. A perfect translation does not exist, well at least not in your language. But if you must know well picture this 50 billion rainbows and the sun is Setting and the moon is setting also, and your there in a gazebo. Then God descends from heaven and he gives you a million dollars. Take that Feeling then put into a song. I could translate it word by word but that would take way too long. Incredible, funny, and filled with bad words. The rest is pretty easy to understand. We do not recommend that you use this word in an irresponsible way like the video may suggest , but it is very entertaining! Fuck, as most of the other words in English, has arrived from Germany. In English, fuck folds into many grammatical categories. As part of a word: Or as almost every word in a sentence: Use this unique, flexible word more often in your daily speech. It will identify the quality of your character immediately. Say it loudly and proudly: Learn English with Two and a Half Men: The teacher is not at all what he expected. To bother with that kinda thing: This seen is hilarious!

But what should your students do with that information once they have it? What are some real life applications of listening exercises? Here are some activities you can use in your ESL classroom to give your students a practical and realistic way to apply their listening skills. So why not challenge everyone in your class to listen and record personal information from their conversation partner? Have your students role play in which one person must fill out a form with personal information from his conversation partner. The form could be a school application, a job application, a survey for information, or a vacation planner. If you can, get a native speaker to play the part of the information giver and let your students listen for the information they will need to fill out their forms. Give your students a town map either real or one you design for classroom purposes and give them directions to various places in the town. After students listen to a set of directions, ask them where in the town they are. This activity is also a great lead to review directional words as well as U. Are you scheduling auto repairs or a cleaning service? Whatever the reason, your students can simulate phone calls in which they schedule appointments. Have students work in pairs role playing a phone conversation in which one person makes an appointment and the other person schedules that appointment. Make sure each student gets a chance to play both parts during the pair work. Then have your students take on the part of the interviewer. Students can listen to the recording, make notes about the speaker, and then decide if they would hire her for whatever job they are filling. If you like, have your students listen to recordings from three different people and then decide who they would give the job to. Make sure each person gives the reasons they think their choice is the best qualified. Give students some practice listening to and learning a monologue of information in a variety of contexts. You may want to include a classroom lecture, a server giving information about menu items at a fancy restaurant, a political debate, an infomercial, or a doctor giving a patient medical information and instructions. ESL teachers have so many sources when it comes to interesting and lively listening material, but theoretical listening activities can only take you so far. Giving them real life tasks based on listening tasks will give them a practical and hands on outlet for their listening practice. What are some real life listening tasks you use with your students?
