Many on both sides of this divide carry a tinder box of opinions that can catch fire at the slightest provocation. Students of American history well know that American institutions have been tested in battle before and survived. I learned this the hard way. In , I was elected to serve on the board of directors of a fairly large business. We were a collegial group that spent a considerable amount of time together. At one board meeting in , the board members who lived in town, including the chairman, and their wives hosted a dinner for those of us who were from out of town. The dinner was at one of the best restaurants in that city, and it started out as a warm and friendly affair. I was seated in the middle of the table, across from the wife of the chairman. From reading the paper and listening to the news, I believed that Dr. Foster was a well-regarded physician who had performed thousands of medical procedures over his long career, including about one hundred legal abortions. It was now clear to me that I had inadvertently hit a very hot button. I accepted that apology. Foster, even though President Clinton ultimately withdrew his nomination because of the kind of opposition that was expressed during that dinner. I also now understand that I should not have accepted the apology from the chairman. Rather, I should have told him that if he wanted to apologize, it should be for choosing to be a silent bystander who allowed the attempted intimidation to continue, and that if his wife wanted to apologize for her own unacceptable behavior, she should do it herself. While this would have been much harder to do than accepting his apology, I regret not doing it. This experience also made me realize that abortion and other equally divisive subjects should not be discussed without first establishing some ground rules. For example, when I was told that Dr. Foster was not qualified to be the Surgeon General because he was an abortionist, I should have said that I had a different view, but that I did not want to discuss him any further unless we all agreed that we could disagree about this without becoming disagreeable. In the absence of such agreement, I could have stayed silent and avoided the whole incident. In addition, even if everyone had agreed to this ground rule, when the conversation became disagreeable, I could have changed the subject myself since any further discussion was likely to generate heat but no light. I also learned that it is probably best to avoid mixing emotionally charged subjects with alcohol. Even though I am sure that none of us at that dinner had too much to drink, I think the wine lowered some of our inhibitions, which helped all of us inadvertently walk onto that mine field. While these are pretty simple rules, I hope they may help you avoid or defuse situations that could otherwise become really ugly really fast.
