Flame is placed last because there can be a tendency to "see nothing else" when flame is showing. Visible flame at least identifies one part of the structure that is lost and defines the point of attack that will prevent further loss of life and property. Smoke, on the other hand, has the potential to suddenly become flame when the conditions are right. The movement of air into the involved compartment, combined with heat indicators, can assist in determining how close we are to the fire origin, sudden changes and likely direction of fire spread. Ed and I had worked closely together as co-authors of a book called 3D Firefighting and we had numerous discussions on the finer points of reading fire. He convinced me that it was critical to include B for "building" in my acronym: Although I thought it was a good idea, it was only later that I realized how vital it is. My practical experience was based on fighting fires in the city of Brisbane, which has a humid, sub-tropical climate. Our construction typically focuses on making the most of mild winters and staying cool in the hot summer months. My discussions with Ed highlighted the impact of different construction methods on what indicators were likely to be visible. Construction found in temperate climates usually features heavy insulation with double- or triple-glazed windows. This not only impacts what indicators are likely to be present, but it can have a significant influence on how the fire will develop. Further, the global trend toward energy-efficient construction and the increasing use of composite engineered building materials is making it more difficult to predict the rate of fire development and time to collapse. For this reason, we should continually reassess the situation in the context of the particular building construction and temper our actions with an understanding that sometimes the indicators can be difficult to see. The type of building construction will have an enormous impact on how the fire develops and how long the structure will be stable. The use or occupancy of the building may give some indication of the likely fire load, type and location. Some initial findings include: Flashover will occur in most buildings if sufficient air is available. Compartments with limited natural air flow are less likely to flash over before the available air is consumed. Heavy brick or cement-rendered walls will absorb a lot of energy, which could delay flashover. Backdraft is more likely in energy-efficient buildings with good insulation and sealed windows often double- or triple-glazed. The superior insulation and double glazing will tend to hold the heat energy in the compartment and some of the heat indicators will be less obvious. Fire gas ignition is most likely to occur in structures featuring voids, ducts, shafts, balloon frame construction, large open plans, high ceilings, and false or suspended ceilings. These features allow smoke to be transported and accumulate in areas adjacent to the compartment of origin, or some distance from it. Modifications can create unexpected openings or voids. The unburnt fuel in the smoke is often partially mixed with fresh air and can accumulate to flammable concentrations. The most obvious outcome of reading the fire is to be able to identify the location of the fire and predict where it will go with or without our intervention. The key factor to determine: The tactical ventilation plan must anticipate this and include actions that will minimize this potential and deal with it in a controlled manner. This could include actions such as deliberately keeping sections of the structure under-ventilated anti-ventilation, delaying ventilation until hoselines are in place to cut off the potential fire progression, or cooling the gases before opening up the building. Fuel-controlled fires are less likely to react suddenly after opening up the structure. The Next Step The chart on p. It remains a work in progress that will continue to mature through collaboration with motivated, knowledgeable and experienced international firefighters and fire scientists. We cannot do this alone or in isolation. We must build bridges between firefighters and fire scientists. Their work will be critical to advancing our knowledge of fire behavior and reducing fireground injuries and deaths—but it also takes a commitment from each and every firefighter to study this new science, and adjust tactics as needed.

I had a wonderful time, and I really felt at homeâ€”I discovered that Mexicans have a lot in common with my people Egyptians. I was very pleased to do so, and here are the key eight trends that I talked about. These are not necessarily an exhaustive list and most likely there are other trends that I have not mentioned. Change in the Goal of Teaching English In my opinion, there are two key changes in the purpose of teaching English. Secondly, English is not viewed as an end in itself but as a means to learn content such as science and mathematics. Content and language integrate learning CLIL is an approach where the English teacher uses cross-curricular content and so the students learn both the content and English. Early Start in Teaching English Many countries have started teaching English in earlier grades at school. Also in , Japan introduced English in the primary stage, and, in , Dubai introduced English in the KG stage instead of Grade 1. Change in the Approach to Teaching Culture Both the local or native and international culture dominate in English language classes. There is less focus on teaching the culture of native speakers of English unless there is a specific purpose for doing so. Changing View of an English Teacher It is increasingly being recognized that the quality or effectiveness of teachers is determined by their linguistic, teaching, and intercultural competence rather than their being a native speaker of English. Change in Teaching Content and Test Design Teachers use a range of local texts or English translations of literature in the classroom. The use of L1 as appropriate as well as the use of a variety of accents in listening activities or tests are encouraged in English language classrooms. E-Learning Because of the proliferation of tablets and smart phones, I believe that textbooks will disappear in a few years. Furthermore, the access to knowledge in terms of flexibility and mobility has changed drastically. Strategic Teaching and Learning Teaching in English language classes focuses on fostering student thinking as well as language content, outcomes, and learning activities. There are significant and complex student-teacher interactions inside and outside the classroom. The gamification of learning is emerging as a way to make language learning more engaging and relevant to the younger generation. Teachers as Life-Long Learners In a knowledge-based society and to remain competitive and employable, teachers are expected to engage in continuous professional development or professional learning activities from the beginning to the end of their careers. As with any other profession, teachers are also expected to assume greater responsibility for their own professional learning, continually developing their knowledge and skills. How have these trends affected your teaching? I look forward to hearing from you about additional trends that I neglected to mention.
