

1: Rediscovering Life without Clonazepam - Black Bear Lodge

The life and death of cells appears to be governed, rather, by the developing form of the whole in which they participate. But this has been a truth hard for biologists to assimilate, since it has no explanation in the usual causal sense.

I felt like a circus performer spinning plates for a thrilled audience every Sunday. As the crowds grew larger, the pressure to add more plates grew. I wanted to continue growing and launching new ministries, but in spite of my apostolic drive, the grind had brought me to a halt. It took a three-month sabbatical and a few trusted mentors to help me deconstruct what had happened. To put it simply, in my zeal to win converts and grow the church, I had lost my focus on discipleship. Do you remember the words of Christ in Matthew? His actual words were: Anything less is to live in disobedience. A disciple is a follower of Christ, is obedient to Christ, and part of that is allowing ourselves to be used by the Holy Spirit to make other disciples. We had small groups. We offered ten-week studies on specific topics or books of the Bible. But these were producing few disciples and quite frankly, our ministries functioned more as a way to assimilate people into the life of the church rather than as a way to release them into ministry. Discipleship is not just another program of the church. It ought to be a core value and function. If we are not making disciples who are discipling others, then the worship gatherings and ministry programs are all falling short. A rediscovery of discipleship is a necessary step in generating a multiplication movement. We need a revival. Mike Colaw is the lead pastor at Trinity. He invited me to join the team and we started the process of re-engineering a year-old church around discipleship as the primary engine for multiplication. Trinity had experienced rapid growth the previous five years, but addition and multiplication are different. We needed a new ministry principle if we wanted to multiply. The outcome of those conversations was a small booklet called A Blueprint for Making Disciples. The goal was to make discipleship accessible to everyone. People are often told to go and make disciples but rarely given instructions on how it can be done. Here are five things we have prioritized in our blueprint: The process is simple. People read one chapter of the Bible a day, journal how God is speaking, answer accountability questions, and pray for the lost. By doing this daily, and meeting weekly in a small discipleship group, they receive the modeling needed to make disciples of others. The curriculum is the Bible. We link discipleship directly to the only book that is fully inspired by God. The curriculum never runs out and never runs dry. The teacher is the Holy Spirit. If this process can only be led by professionals, it will never result in a movement. The focus is helping others learn how to hear the voice of God and then trust in the power of the Holy Spirit. The priority is obedience. The result is multiplication. As people grow in their love for God and his Word, the natural outcome should be a growing love for the lost and a passion to step out in obedience to disciple others. By the grace of God, what began with a four-week training of 20 discipleship group leaders soon multiplied to 75 people and now well over that are involved in a weekly discipleship relationship. The answer is local church discipleship and leadership development. In the article "Recruiting: The Final Act of a Dying Church," Neil Cole wrote that recruiting new people and leaders is a consumer-oriented idea and is a symptom of one of our most serious afflictions. Recruitment is much like picking out produce at the grocery. Someone else did the work of cultivating the soil, planting seeds, growing and harvesting the fruit, and then others conveniently pick it up and take it home for consumption. When it comes to disciple-making, if we only focus on recruiting and never invest in farming, the pool of disciples and leaders will run dry until we are all left with nothing. They raise up their own. The last words of Christ are clear: Are you making disciples? What are their names? If you are drawing a blank, it might be time to ask whether you take the commands of Christ seriously. What would happen if we all took discipleship seriously? It could be the beginning of a movement! E-mail Jon Wiest at jwiest@encountertrinity.com.

2: Rediscovering Discipleship - Wesleyan Life

Anthony de Mello's Rediscovering Life: Awaken to Reality is a powerfully insightful read and a wonderful blend of the author/teacher's style and approach. Published posthumously, this book serves as a wonderful companion piece to Awareness (see my review from 6/19/17).

Continue Reading Taking clonazepam as part of a doctor-prescribed plan for controlling seizures or anxiety can help you cope and remain healthy on a daily basis. However, the drug is habit forming, and you may find you are overusing or abusing the drug or have become dependent due to long-term use. There are serious physical, emotional and social side effects to taking clonazepam, and you may find these effects sufficiently unpleasant that you want to move beyond your drug use. How to Find a Life beyond Clonazepam What would your life be like if you were free from your dependence on or addiction to clonazepam? There are many people who have moved beyond a dependence on the drug to live a satisfying and productive life, and there is hope for recovery for anyone. To begin your life without clonazepam see your medical doctor or an addiction recovery specialist, and be honest about your situation. Be honest about the beginnings of your drug use, and be willing to at least broach the topic of issues of a personal, social or physical nature that might be playing a role in your addiction. Your doctor should be able to help you move beyond clonazepam by recommending other resources for recovery. Another option for clonazepam addiction recovery is getting the help of a qualified addiction recovery counselor. These professionals can listen to you and identify issues that affect your drug use and the quality of your life. If you have the advice and counsel of an experienced counselor, you can discover ways to modify your behaviors and environments in ways that reduce stress and help you avoid situations that can trigger drug use. 3: Rediscovering Life: Awaken to Reality by Anthony de Mello

I want to thank everyone " more than people " who sent congratulations to us in response to last week's long column. Thank you very much for your wonderful wishes.

There is within us an urgent desire, a thirst only quenched when our relationship with God is restored and nurtured in an uninterrupted and free flowing interaction with one another. When this occurs we begin to discover the delight, which a harmonious ever-flowing interaction with God brings about. Much like the vibrations of a tuning fork we are tuned in with God. This brings about a symphony from within us and through us to the world around us, which is individually unique and delightful, as we become a body soul and spirit multidimensional tapestry designed by God to be fulfilled in harmony with Him. If we are to move from our created desire for God to a life of delighting in Him and the manifestation of what He created us to be and do will it will require the re-establishment of the relationship He designed for us to have. We see from the Bible that the mission of Jesus the Messiah is the re-establishment of our relationship with God the father. He is the only way to the father, the open door, the way the truth and the life. The development of this or Working out our salvation growing in God like any relationship requires that we Hebrews We understand that we are saved by grace and are to rest in Him for our salvation, deliverance from sin and its penalty of death and separation from God. What does this diligently seeking Him look like you might ask? It requires that we rediscover who God is and what are His ways. This includes discovering the names and attributes of God, what they reveal about His nature and how He interacts with people from the pages of the Bible in conjunction with these revealed qualities. It requires discovering who we are for we are fearfully and wonderfully made. Then we can grow in our understanding of how the elements of who we are work together to become the unique tapestry God has designed us to be. This tapestry is not merely a collection of the elements of who we are but becomes complete as we allow our creator to bring true life to those elements. A very unique and life giving aspect of our relationship with God is learning who we are in Him and putting aside our old nature with its understanding and behavior, which bring death and putting on or living according to our new nature in God as empowered by His grace and the working of His Spirit in us through the active life giving truth of His Word the Bible. It is only as we learn of Him that we can more completely yield to Him and make the choices by grace and through faith, which are the substance of the working out part of our daily being saved. We enter into our new life as we are born again by the spirit through Jesus the Messiah. This transformational process of becoming the unique individual God designed us to be, the original Greek calls Sodzo or being saved. The word Sodzo or salvation is a present continuous word, which means that our salvation starts with the new birth and continues on as long as we are in this earthly realm. We must decide daily and sometimes, moment by moment to live according to the new nature and to deny and put to death the old nature. These spiritual disciplines help us reject the world, the flesh and the devil and help us nurture and grow into the way of life of a person who is pleasing God, who is made right with God and who is walking with Him according to His original design for us.

They are intended to document the post-reductionist, post-Darwinian revolution now in the making. The focus at present is on molecular biology – especially gene regulation and genomic studies as they bear on our understanding of organisms and their evolution. But the contextual, interlinked nature of everything going on in the organism means that you can expect occasional wide-ranging excursions in these commentaries. Improvising the Dance of Life Nov. A Dynamic and Living Balance Dec. An Overview Every organism is continually dying in order to live. Breaking-down activities are prerequisites for building up. Complex molecules are synthesized, only to be degraded later, with their constituents recycled or excreted. In multicellular organisms such as vertebrates, many cells must die so that others may divide, differentiate, and proliferate. You and I have distinct fingers and toes thanks to massive cell death during development. In general, our various organs are sculpted through cell death as well as cell growth and multiplication. During development the body produces far more neurons than the adult will possess, and an estimated ninety-five percent of the cell population of the thymus gland dies off by the time the mature gland is formed. The life and death of cells appears to be governed, rather, by the developing form of the whole in which they participate. But this has been a truth hard for biologists to assimilate, since it has no explanation in the usual causal sense. One way to register the problem is to ask yourself what you would think if I suggested that organisms in populations thrive or die off in a manner governed by the evolutionary outcome toward which they are headed – that the pattern of thriving and dying off, in other words, becomes what it is in order to achieve that outcome. It is not a thought any evolutionist is likely to tolerate. But perhaps the occasional intrepid biologist will be moved to inquire: After all, we can also ask about the cells populating our bodies:

5: REDISCOVERING LIFE - DE MELLO, ANTHONY - NEW PAPERBACK BOOK | eBay

Rediscovering Life is a timeless and compassionate book that will awaken you to the beauty of human experience and increase your ability to see God in all things. Author Bio ANTHONY DE MELLO was a Jesuit priest known throughout the world for his writings and spiritual conferences.

It means to be delighted, exhilarated, electrified and galvanized. When you are thrilled, you experience a spine-tingling and breath-stopping excitement, a heady sensation. Colours are brighter, sounds are sharper, your heart races, and you are pulsing with energy. You can hardly wait to step out and begin the day! When You Lose the Thrill But wait! Lately, I had been anything but thrilled. For the past few weeks, a long, hot dry summer had dragged on. Like the trees and flowers around me, I had felt dispirited, chugging along through the days. Where Did it Go? Small annoyances were robbing me of my appreciation of life. Instead of waking with a feeling of happiness, eager to welcome the day, I found myself dwelling on the things that are not quite right. Whatever happened to the U-curve of happiness that I wrote about in May? Or the paradox of aging , where I was supposed to be happier with every passing day? Making a Change I needed to get back there! I tried the things I usually do – gratitude exercises, journaling, meditation, positive self-talk. Nothing worked this time. I needed something more. So I decided to change it up. Try a different route. The next morning, I prepared a small backpack, wrote a note for my husband, and left the house. When I stepped out into the patio at dawn, a smudge of amber lay between the skyline and the stars. I stood there for a few minutes, watching it widen; refracted light from the sun washing over more and more of the sky. It was a miracle – a thrilling show that happened every day. Choosing a Different Route But I was not done. I made a quick decision to forgo my usual walk, and visit an old haunt instead. When I arrived, I was relieved to see that nothing had changed. The entrance to the park was just as I remembered it – a majestic canopy of trees. Familiar paths welcomed me as I walked through and veered left towards the centre of the park. Oaks, firs, arbutus – they were all still there, a little taller, a little wider, but essentially unchanged. I sat at the base of an old eighty-foot arbutus, and drank in the quiet air. I could feel my pulse slowing, my tension leaving me. I followed several pathways, then came back to the old arbutus. It was now noon, and I stopped for lunch under the spreading branches, out of the glare of the October sun. I gazed through the trees, I listened to the birds and I fed my crusts to the squirrels. Rediscovering the Thrill Anew Later, as I sat at my desk, and opened my laptop, words began to flow. It started with a twinge, just a shiver of anticipation along my spine. How do you get out of a rut when nothing in life seems thrilling? Are there places you go for inspiration? Do you use a gratitude journal or other tool to maintain a positive focus?
