However, some earlier censuses did include information about some Native Americans. Slave Information

The census contains a lot of records relating to slaves and slaveholders. It is important to note that slaves are grouped according to owner names and ages. Sometimes birth orders and names of slave family members can be determined by simply comparing tax list data with probate inventories. The census will, in many cases, list neighbors who might be related to the person or persons of interest. That can help researchers to distinguish one family from another, even if the two families have the same name. Because Native Americans were not eligible to hold a seat in the US House of Representatives, their population was not considered relevant to the purpose of the census. Slave Information

Slaves are listed according to the last names of their owners. This information can be compared to tax list data and probate inventories to determine names and birth orders of family members. You can cross reference that information with tax lists and probate inventories in order to locate multiple members of the same slave family. You may also find that some of those family members are clearly listed by age in the census records. There are some scattered manufacturing schedules scattered amongst the census documents, which can give you further information. The census also asked about the industries of household members, requesting a listing for all those engaged in commercial business, manufacturing, or agriculture. Slaves were listed according to the name of the slaveholder. In either case, you might be able to determine the names of family members of the free men or slaves in question. However, to do this you may have to compare the census information with tax lists and probate inventory lists. It lists the names and ages of Revolutionary War pensioners. As a result, you can use that information to find a person of interest in other historical documents relating to the Revolutionary War. Slave Information

The slave listings in the census were also more detailed than the listings in previous censuses. For example, the census has listings for manumitted slaves slaves who were released and became free. The names of the slaves were not listed, but their sexes, ages and mental and physical health characteristics were listed.
