Right place, right time, right move. Now that Phyllis and Charles are settled at Linden Ponds and free from the burden of home maintenance they have more time.

Families should not feel guilty when they decide it is time to move a loved one into a facility. Trying to keep loved ones at home can possibly put a parent or loved one in jeopardy. If the home is not safe or if the caregiver is stressed, there are situations when a facility may be far better than care in the home. Interestingly enough, new research indicates several recent studies funded by the National Institute of Health, have found that institutionalized dementia patients are twice or three times as likely to die following placement as those who stay at home, yet the new study says that the risk plummets the longer a person can stay at home. These research findings suggest possibly the disruption in routine, less contact with family and friends, or poor care may result in the increased risk of death. Contrary to this, in some cases, early placement in a facility may be the best alternative particularly if the primary caregiver is in denial about the disease or burned out. To help families keep loved ones at home for as long as possible, McClendon advocates expanding support services and training for caregivers. Support services would include enlisting caregiving help from an agency or private caregiver or hiring a geriatric care manager or care consultant. Adult Day Care outside the home can afford loved ones the comforts of home and at the same time give families the respite they need. Training for caregivers is often available in the community through various agencies and organizations. Is support in the home available such as respite services for the caregiver? Is the caregiver jeopardizing his or her own health or relationships with others? Is the caregiver realistic and knowledgeable about the illness? Does the caregiver provide needed mental stimulation and emotional support as well as social and physical activities? Is there a full time in-home caregiver available? How aware is the patient of the surroundings? A move may be less disruptive to someone who is less aware. Is the home environment safe? Are doors alarmed if that person wanders; are there safety precautions in place for hot water, stoves and household chemicals? Is there room in a dementia care facility that best meets your loved ones needs? Granted every family situation is unique. Do your research and learn about all of your options prior to making a placement outside the home. In the end, families need to make a decision that is most beneficial to their loved one. Caring for a loved one at home may present a significant personal and financial burden and moving a relative into a long-term care facility is not an easy decision to make. Have had a look at the highways plans related to the school. Did the Council do thorough the stakeholder engagement on these highway changes? Hillary Taylor is with Duncan Mclean. Other statements following shortly. Not enough hours in the day at the moment, but gradually catching up. He also said they have a high failure rate yet again is this true? John Hansen 31 October at Further to your email of 19 October, I am now in a position to respond having recently visited the site with Andy Instone. The Highway Authority issued a licence for the temporary access The process is not subject to public consultation. The areas are based on the results of previous archaeological investigations of the site. The areas encompass those trenches containing the most significant archaeological remains. The licence is limited to 6 months. The archaeological investigations are scheduled to last up to 20 weeks. A banksman will oversee safety. During the main construction access will be via the Lower Luton Road provided by the planning permission e The site welfare units are located outside of areas of strip, map and record. The location was chosen because no significant archaeology is expected to be found there. The two trial trenches in that location revealed no significant archaeology. I trust this response addresses your questions. If you have any further queries please do not hesitate to contact me.
