Giosue Carducci Italian poet, critic, scholar, and orator, winner of the Nobel Prize for Literature in , highly influential literary figure in his time. Carducci was regarded as the unofficial national poet of modern Italy. Already from his college years he was fascinated with the restrained style of Roman and Greek antiquity, and striving for classical ideals characterized also his mature work. His father, Michele Carducci, was a doctor, and a member of the Carbonari, an advocate of the unification of Italy. Due to political reasons, the family was forced to move several times, finally settling in for two year in Florence, where Carducci started to write. At home he grew up in the atmosphere of rationalism and patriotism. From his father Carducci inherited his admiration of classic poets, but he also read such Romantic writers as Lord Byron and Friedrich Schiller. In his own early poetry he was not tempted by the excesses of romanticism. Carducci spent some time teaching patriotic songs to the village boys and wrote odes to Saint Elizabeth and Saint John the Baptist. Soon the elder Carducci was in conflict with the authorities, and was forced to take a low-paying job as surgeon in Piancastagnaio. After receiving his Ph. These years were difficult for the poet: In Carducci married Elvira Menicucci; they had four children. For a short period, before he was appointed professor of Italian literature at the University of Bologna, Carducci taught Greek at a high school in Pistoia. Carducci was extremely industrious and he gained a huge popularity as a lecturer. As a critic he was fierce, using in his reviews language which made his opponents call him a poeta del maiale poet of a pig. In Carducci was still a monarchist but in a short period he became an enthusiastic republican and opposed the power of the church. Satan was not for him the embodiment of evil and corruption, but a synonym for restless progress. In he was made a senator for life. Carducci died on February 16, , near Lucca, Duchy of Lucca.
