Feb 7, Companies employing ten people or less are the economic powerhouses of the twenty-first century. Now in a new and updated edition, Running a 21st-Century Small Business tells you how you can start your very own small business--and keep it running profitably. The idea of being in business for oneself is as American as apple pie or baseball. This is not to say that the goal is unknown in other nations or cultures. In fact, citizens of Australia and Taiwan have an even higher level of interest in self-employment than do citizens in the United States. Many do take the plunge. What would motivate a person to risk his livelihood, his marriage, and his emotional health? Why would a person want to work sixty or eighty hours per week for little or no income? Who are these entrepreneurs who give up the safe life for a taste of life in the fast lane? What is the big deal, anyway? The pursuit of the almighty dollar and all that goes with it? Are we a nation of aspiring Donald Trumps? Many, if not most, of those who choose the path of self-employment expect to make more money than they could as an employee. Personal independence takes a close second to hard cash in driving an employee to become a boss. This type of individual may find it hard to work for others, or simply want to do it his way. Thus the talented and motivated female often finds that the only hope for reaching her full potential is to open her own enterprise. Another large group of small business owners is motivated by a desire to make a special contribution to the worldâ€”one they believe would be impossible to make working for a profit-seeking enterprise. The list of those who find small business an outlet for their community-service orientation goes on and on. Interestingly, this selfless approach often results in much greater financial success than the business founded to create wealth, probably as a result of the tireless devotion that such an enterprise produces. When the going gets very rough or too easy, many who have only dollar signs in their eyes lose interest. Those who are pursuing the greater good may feel a stronger compulsion to keep on pushing. Simply being out of a job has often pushed people into self-employment. This seems to be particularly true when an individual has lost his job due to a merger, an acquisition, a dot-com bust, or changing economic conditions such as military downsizing. Having something to prove can be a major motivational factor. A parent, sibling, spouse, or other significant person who is doing well in his own business, or speaks of others who are, could create pressure to give it a try. A rival is making more money than our budding businessman. This group may be acting from a neurotic point of view, and as such will likely be very unhappy in business. Some of our most successful and well-known businesspeople are very wealthy and very unhappy because their drive comes from this unhealthy direction. Only rarely does an individual who aspires to a life of self-employment fit just one of these categories. More frequently, there is a mixture of forces at work. For instance, the desire for financial independence coupled with a need to call all the shots is a potent combination. The overriding fact remains that, for whatever reason, many in our population will take a stab at going it alone. Our goal will be to provide a set of practical guides that will allow you to come to a logical conclusion about whether you should go out on your own. Every attempt will be made to give you an overview of every aspect of the decision-making process.

2: Network Marketing Is NOT The Business For The 21st Century - Ethan Vanderbilt

In the 21st century almost all organizations use Information and Communication Technologies to efficiently manage their operations, to help managers make better decisions and achieve competitive advantage, and to facilitate seamless internal and external communications with their employees, customers, partners, and other stakeholders. Businesses Pre-Information Systems Until the s, before the widespread adoption of personal computers and the Internet, companies were using information systems to manage data processing and record-keeping activities associated with business transactions like maintaining the general ledger book keeping , payroll, billing, inventory management, etc. The focus was mainly on maintaining files and databases related to day-to-day operations. Communications, both internal and external, relied on paper, telephone, faxes, and other analog media. Information systems have evolved over the last 40 years, including the move from the mainframe computer of the s to personal computers becoming an integral part of the tracking and organizational process in the s. The arrival of the mainstream internet in the s expanded business capabilities and the role of information systems to a global system of interaction. Today, the main focus of companies is to stay globally competitive by leveraging the capabilities of modern information and communication technologies ICT. Globalization, collaboration, and integration have become the new drivers in this competitive arena. To remain competitive, companies are investing in modern information systems like Enterprise Resource Planning ERP software, which integrate the different functional areas of the business, and provide consistent real-time data for fast decision making. ERP systems help companies manage their operations seamlessly across the globe. Throughout this process, the order often had to be re-typed as it passed through various departments, increasing the potential for human error. There was no accurate account order status because there was no official tracking device to alert each department. Today, companies have eliminated the inaccuracy of paper-based tracking by implementing ERP systems. In a recent study conducted by Panorama Consulting Solutions, 63 percent of companies used their ERP software to eliminate inefficiencies in processes such as order tracking. Instead of standalone computer systems, ERP uses a unified program that links various functional departments such as finance, HR, manufacturing, warehouse, planning, purchasing, inventory, sales, and marketing. While each department may have its own set of software modules, the software is interconnected so that information can be shared throughout the organization. Once one department is finished updating and processing the order, it is automatically routed to the next department so that everyone is alerted to changes made. Adopting the Global Market Many businesses have begun to participate in the global market, as it presents a chance for greater revenue and larger business prospects. Already, the global information systems market has seen consistent demands from several businesses. The challenges vary depending on the size of businesses. For smaller businesses, controlling operations and storing information are less complicated. As businesses grow, especially those intersecting with global relations, information systems are used to manage operations accurately without growing the number of employees. The growing supply chains require that software solutions be used in the following sectors: Web-based ordering Product configuration The Future of Information Systems As companies try to reduce costs, improve productivity, employers are looking to ERP systems to help them grow and remain competitive globally. Information systems have enhanced productivity for businesses. A career in managing information systems is ideal for those looking to advance in a Fortune company. As businesses and organizations today require more and more technical skills, companies are looking for employees who will help manage and operate the various information-based tools.
