In The Four Seasons of Marriage, he describes how marriages commonly move from one season to another - from summer to fall or perhaps from winter to spring. He differs from some writers, however, in holding that each season may repeat itself numerous times over the long course of a marriage.

Not bad for a woman who still thinks of herself as being only 43 years old. Maybe my musings will capture some of your own experiences of the seasons of a marriage, too. The Spring of Marriage “ We were young and intoxicated with desire and optimism that every expectation we ever dreamed of was possible. In hindsight, I also realize how we were overflowing with projections and blinded by the light of the mythological god and goddess. I actually thought of us as Eros and Aphrodite, the god and goddess of love! Yes, we were in love and playing house in the suburbs of Newark as my husband finished his MBA and I worked to support us. He told everyone he married me for my money. The Summer of Marriage “ We brought our two children into the world. The kids filled our lives with love, fun and adult responsibility. Later, in this second season of the marriage cycle, our children flew away from their carefully constructed family nest and into their young college lives. And, just as I cried when I dropped them off at nursery school, I wept again after dropping them off at college. When we arrived home we went in and looked around. The silence, the stillness was deafening. No children opening the refrigerator door every 10 minutes. No children sleeping in until noon or at least until their father revved up the lawn mower under their bedroom windows to get their sorry butts out of bed! He understood that our children being gone was a hard adjustment for me but gently stressed that they needed to live their own lives and we needed to begin our next season. We also watched our son, Richard, fall in love and marry the woman of his dreams. Little did we know that a college investment would turn into a family blessing. Despite her courageous efforts, our sweet daughter never did return to complete wellness because her brain tumor outsmarted all of us, including her doctors. We mournfully had to learn another painful lesson: That was when Katie, at 28 years old, left this world and ours. The autumn of our marriage presented us with a monumental challenge: We had to figure out how we would survive this ultimate loss. We pitched in wherever we could, tried to act like we knew nothing about raising kids, and pretended to keep up with the little ones physically. We credit our grandchildren for giving us back our lives. During the latter part of this autumn season we shared what we wanted to do with our life now. I still wanted the focus of work as a counselor and writer; my husband would keep up his volunteer work and teaching at Temple, and we both wanted the pleasure of play and seeing our grandchildren. Standing on the hills of Assisi for our 45th wedding anniversary, I felt the rewards and peace St. Francis spoke about and the personal rewards of going the distance. Not every couple is as lucky. The Winter of Marriage “ While we are not there yet, we realize old age will be the final season of marriage. My husband will be Odysseus, the Greek hero who fought the good fight, despite the perils and challenges he encountered during the previous three seasons. His wife will remain a combination of Aphrodite, Golde and the Artemis she really always was, the independent woman he fell in love with over four decades ago.

In The Good Life, Colson, with co-author Harold Fickett, shares life stories of people who have to make decisions in their lives. The book covers many issues from homosexuality and evolution to consumerism and post-modernism.

Since Weiner-Davis is an expert, you might assume that marriage would be easy. Creating a lasting marriage is a humbling experience. It is part skill, part luck, elbow grease and blind determination. At no other time in your relationship is your feeling of well-being and physical desire for each other as intense. The newness and excitement of the relationship stimulates production of chemicals in your bodies that increase energy, positive attitudes, heighten sexuality and sensuality. This is when reality sets in. Little things start to bother you like stinky breath in the morning, toilet seats left up, stuff strewn on the counter and forgetting to pay bills. You argue a lot. Reminding yourself you made a life-long commitment, you start to understand the real meaning of eternity. Spouses often start to feel like members of opposing teams. Couples battle to get their partner to admit they are wrong. Every disagreement is an opportunity to define the marriage. Both partners dig in their heels. Other people resign themselves to the situation and lead separate lives together. Requiring a major leap of faith, those who take it are the fortunate ones because the best of marriage is yet to come. They work to live more peaceably. They seek wise counsel from close friends and family, and marriage seminars or counseling. Hardheadedness is easier to forgive as each person recognizes that neither party is exactly easy to live with. They recognize they have to accept the good and the bad. Fights happen less frequently and are not as intense or emotional as before. You begin to appreciate differences between you and your spouse. You realize you have come full circle.

We need this mindset in each season of marriage; in fact, I regret that I was not more sensitive to Barbara during some of the early seasons of our marriage. As a new bride, she needed my understanding, love, compassion, and a listening ear.

Bex is the last of their trio of friends who is unmarried. She is somewhat envious of her friends, who have found their true loves and have babies on the way. Bex had been blissfully in love years before, but the man she loved was killed in the war. Tate has moved to Mustang Creek with his two young sons, ready to start a new business and get on with his life. I really liked the way they were initially brought together by the matchmaking efforts of her two friends. As the book starts, they are brought together again by something much different. Bex ends up caring for her nephew while her sister tries to get her life together. Josh is a great kid and loves being with his aunt any time he can. Tate plans to take his boys on a fishing trip and invites Bex and Josh along. Tate and Bex connect quickly, and their attraction deepens. I loved seeing Tate and Bex together. They manage some time alone, giving them a chance to share their pasts and their fears. But most of their time together includes the three boys. I loved seeing them settle in to their relationship, with all the little things that entails. Bex returned the favor by helping Tate get through the involvement of his father and another investor in his business. I loved the way that Tate gives Bex the space and time she needs to work through things, and that once she does, Bex is fully committed. I loved seeing the way she got around her fear. The ending was sweet and romantic and perfect for Tate and Bex. I loved the theme of friendship that was as present in this book as in the previous two. Hadleigh and Melody are there for Bex during her rough times, just as she was there for them. I liked that that same friendship extended to the men in their lives. I also loved the small town of Mustang Creek, where everyone knows everyone else and their business. There were the caring bits, such as the conversation between Bex and the school secretary about Josh. And there were the truly funny parts, such as the comment from a teacher regarding Tate and the upcoming fishing trip: I loved the twist that involved them at the end of the book. So when single dad Tate Calder moves to town, Hadleigh and Melody decide to do a little matchmaking for them. Tate is interested in a relationship but he does not plan to re-marry while Bex thinks she is too busy for a relationship. When Tate offers to include Josh in a weekend fishing trip with him and his two sons, he extends an invitation to Bex to join them. Bex is a successful business woman with a big heart. She is very loyal to her friends and family and she will do anything to help her loved ones. Tate is devoted to his sons and he is willing to make any sacrifice for them. He left a lucrative career so he could spend as much time with them as possible and despite losing their mother, his kids are happy and well-adjusted. He moved to Mustang Creek to begin a horse breeding program and the construction on his home and ranch is nearing completion. Tate is taken off guard by his attraction to Bex but it does not take long for him to become serious about her. Despite their baggage and reservations, neither Tate nor Bex fight their attraction. They quickly settle into their new relationship and for the most part, there is very little conflict between them. Bex is a bit skittish about their romance and she does need a little space to think things through. But once she works through her hesitation, she is fully committed to Tate. They are both honest about not wanting to marry, but as their relationship changes so do their expectations. Will the wounds from the past stand in the way of their future? The plot is realistic and delightfully free of unnecessary drama or angst. The characters are beautifully developed with true to life problems to overcome. Linda Lael Miller concludes this terrific series with another heartwarming romance that old and new fans are going to love.

4: The Four Seasons of Marriage: Secrets to a Lasting Marriage by Gary Chapman

Four Seasons Of Marriage Page 3 WINTER Season of marriage created not by the difficulties of life but by the manner in which a couple responds to those difficulties.

On Sunday, my husband and I will celebrate our eighteenth wedding anniversary. Our wedding day, A couple of months ago, we had a rough day. Neither of us go for superstition, but that Friday the thirteenth lived up to its reputation. It began with an argument and tears and culminated in a rescue mission when my husband had locked himself out of his car on the opposite side of the city. What should have been a twenty-minute drive to unlock his car turned into an hour-long trek due to an interstate accident at rush hour. The problem that day was multifaceted: Was this written for us? Seven pregnancies in ten years. Nothing out of the ordinary. I recall all the months of anticipation leading up to our wedding as I looked forward to being united to my husband in every way. The fun and excitement of sharing a bed, a home, a life. When did it turn from joy to stress? When did it be come okay to be too tired or too busy to connect with my husband, emotionally, intellectually, and physically? Life intrudes with responsibilities, duties, and diapers. Oh, the thousands and thousands of diapers. To everything there is a season. Sure, we all want to have great, happy, and satisfying marriages. But marriage is more. The beautiful thing about seasons is that they change. But you have to endure the cold and darkness of winter to enjoy the rebirth of spring. Two Sting references in one post. Is there an award for that? On the way, we talked about school dances and the various boys on whom I had crushes. Brash Abby is an unlikely source of marital wisdom, but she shares what she knows with her sister Rebecca:

The summer season of marriage is a time of increased activity. It might even occur at a very busy time of life. It might even occur at a very busy time of life. There's a great quote from the book that really highlights the season of summer.

I recently read The Four Seasons of Marriage. The premise of the book is quite simple: Spring is where most marriages begin. Summer is where life is fun and beautiful. Fall is where the marriage might look fine on the outside, but inside the marriage is changing. When the chilling winds begin to blow, the deterioration of the marriage becomes evident, just as leaves on trees turn color and fall away. Winter is where coldness, harshness, and bitterness prevails. Throughout the book, Chapman uses real stories and comments from many different couples to highlight the various seasons. These provide beneficial glimpses into what other couples experience and helps to better understand each season. An important message of the book is that husbands and wives can and should adapt to the changing seasons of their marriage. The Progress of Seasons As one would expect, most marriages begin in spring and evolve naturally into summer. These are the nicest parts of marriage. If you find yourself in the season of spring or summer, rejoice and continue doing the work to keep it that way. But be careful not to confuse summer with vacation time. The summer season of marriage is a time of increased activity. It might even occur at a very busy time of life. Summer does not equal perfection, but it does mean that couples in this season have a sense of accomplishment and a desire to keep growing. This quote might resonate well with some couples. But it might not sit well with others. If there are concerns about the state of a marriage or uncertainties about the future, it likely means the relationship has progressed to the fall season. Thankfully, it is possible to bring the relationship back to spring or summer. If your marriage is in winter, it may appear beyond hope. There is a way out, and it begins with hope. Have you read this book? If so, did you find it helpful?

Couples in the fall season of their marriage have attitudes of great concern over their marriages; there is an uncertainty about where things are going. The beauty about the fall is the fork in the road that makes itself available to couples.

Gary Chapman Ten years ago, a friend of mine moved to Florida. At the time they moved it was the dead of winter and there were six-foot snow drifts covering half of their house. They were more than happy to leave all of that behind for tropical temperatures and palm trees. Now, years later, they are missing the changing seasons. However, changing seasons when it comes to relationships can be difficult. This is especially true of marriage. Author and marriage expert, Dr. Gary Chapman, says there are four seasons of marriage. Most marriages, he says, move through all four seasons, but not necessarily in order. Which of the following seasons is your marriage in? Couples feel animated and buoyant, and their attitudes towards one another are positive. There is both gratitude and anticipation of the future, and an overall feeling of optimism and trust. However, nothing is perfect. Just as many people suffer from allergies and hay fever during the spring, a spring marriage can contain the same kind of unexpected irritations as well. Attitudes are beautiful, but they must be watered, or else they will wither in the heat of the sun. There is usually a desire to keep growing together. A couple in the summer season of marriage needs to be forewarned, though. Unresolved conflicts under the surface must be brought out if a marriage is to remain in a state of fullness. Yet inside the marriage, things are changing. Couples in the fall season of their marriage have attitudes of great concern over their marriages; there is an uncertainty about where things are going. The beauty about the fall is the fork in the road that makes itself available to couples. Either they can lead into winter with attitudes of neglect and allow the marriage to drift in a negative direction, or they can go back to the spring season with actions that foster a positive relationship. A couple can either grow closer together or drift further apart in this season. The dreams of spring are covered with layers of ice. Communication is relegated to silence, arguments, criticism, and, at times, verbal abuse. Lives are lived independently, although under the same roof. This is caused by rigidity: The emotions ever present in a winter season of marriage are hurt, anger, disappointment, loneliness, and a sense of rejection. The attitudes of spouses in the winter season are a pervasive pessimism, seeing the worst, thinking problems are too big, discouragement, hopelessness, and the nasty habit of blaming the other person. The natural inclination of individuals within a winter season of marriage is to avoid the elements and withdraw. There is either a conscious or subconscious desire to hurt the other spouse with harsh words or even violent acts. Spouses tend to feel detached and desperate for change. There is, however, a positive side to the winter season. Trials produce patience and perseverance, and forgiveness makes room for love. What marriage season are you currently in?
