Explain the foundational knowledge of a particular scientific discipline. Apply principles and techniques of scientific inquiry. Analyze the reciprocal impact of science and society. Quantitative thinking is the formulation of questions that can be addressed using mathematical principles, leading to answers that include reliable and usable measures of accuracy. Computational thinking is the ability to conceive meaningful, information-based representations of the world that can be effectively manipulated using a computer. Courses or course sequences addressing this concept must meet a majority of the student learning outcomes. Only the combination and integration of quantitative and computational courses will serve to meet this learning concept. Explain the application of computational or quantitative thinking across multiple knowledge domains. Apply the foundational principles of computational or quantitative thinking to frame a question and devise a solution in a particular field of study. Identify the impacts of computing and information technology on humanity. Construct a model based on computational methods to analyze complex or large-scale phenomenon. Draw valid quantitative inferences about situations characterized by inherent uncertainty. Evaluate conclusions drawn from or decisions based on quantitative data. Identify and apply formal elements of design or the arts. Explain the historical context of design or the arts. Apply interpretive strategies or methodologies in design or the arts. Employ skills, tools, and methods of working in design or the arts. Produce a fully developed work through iterative processes of design or the arts. It recognizes that people in society have had different experiences and opportunities related to social categories, and challenges students to consider their ethical responsibilities to others in that context and in the context of Ut Prosim, to enhance their capacities to be engaged citizens and visionary leaders in an increasingly diverse society. Students will gain self-awareness of how they are situated relative to those around them based on social identities and foundational knowledge of the interactive dynamics of social identities, power and inequity. Analyze how social identities, statuses, space, place, traditions, and histories of inequity and power shape human experience in the United States particularly or in comparative perspective. Analyze social equity and diversity in the United States particularly or in comparative perspective through multiple perspectives on power and identity. Analyze the interactive relationships between place, space, identity formation, and sense of community in the United States particularly or in comparative perspective. Ethical Reasoning Intercultural and Global Awareness Integrative Concepts The need for students to have knowledge and skills in Ethical Reasoning and Intercultural and Global Awareness is crucial to all aspects of their lives. Students will develop the capacity to recognize these concepts as they apply to any discipline, thus helping them to consider and connect various perspectives. Every Pathways course must address at least one of the Integrative Concepts. Foundational learning of ethical theories, issues, and applications provides tools that enable students to deliberate and assess for themselves claims about ethical issues. It will be met in conjunction with Core Concepts. No extra hours will be necessary. Explain and contrast relevant ethical theories. Identify ethical issues in a complex context. Articulate and defend positions on ethical issues in a way that is both reasoned and informed by the complexities of those situations. Identify advantages and challenges of diversity and inclusion in communities and organizations. Address significant global challenges and opportunities in the natural and human world.
