Shadows is the prequel of the Lux series. It appears to be a kind of spoiler for the first book, Obsidian, but I think it provided us with some basic information about the main characters, aka aliens.

Pulling back, the Arum tried to take his human form. None of the Arum did. Dawson was betting that Arum even knew the name to the light, had whispered it in fear. His brother would love that. White light crashed into the shadowy form, throwing the Arum back several feet. Trees shook and the ground rolled, tossing him to and fro like he was nothing more than a pile of limp socks. And the light took up a fighter stance before him, protective and ready to give his life for his family. A series of bolts of intense light shot over Dawson, smacking into the Arum. A keening, high-pitched wail pierced the sky. God, did he hate that sound. Water under the bridge. Since the draining had been cut off, feeling was returning to his limbs. Pins and needles spread up his legs, over his chest. Sitting up, he still flickered in and out. From the corner of his eye, he saw his brother back the Arum up and then take human form. Pulling out a knife made of obsidian, he launched himself at the Arum, said something in a menacing tone before shoving the blade deep into his stomach. A gurgle cut off another wail. As the Arum splintered into smoky, shadowy pieces, Dawson concentrated on who he was—what he was. He looked into eyes that were identical to his own. No more words needed to be spoken. Not when there were still more out there. Chapter 1 Students filed into class, yawning and still trying to rub the sleep out of their eyes. Melted snow dripped off their parkas and pooled on the scuffed floor. Dawson stretched out his long legs, propping them on the empty seat in front of him. Idly scratching his jaw, he watched the front of the room as Lesa strolled in, making a face at Kimmy, who looked horrified by what the snow had done to her hair. A deep, low chuckle came from behind, and Dawson grinned. The girl cracked him up. Kimmy flipped her off as she flounced to her seat, her eyes trained on him like she was planning her next meal. To Kimmy, any attention appeared to be good attention, especially since she had broken up with Simon. Or had Simon broken up with her? Placing a zebra-print bag on her desk, Kimmy continued to smile at him for another good ten seconds before looking away. Very few made him laugh like Daemon did. And even fewer pissed him off as much. But if Dawson ever needed anything or if there was an Arum nearby, Daemon was the man. A portly older man strolled into class, clutching a stack of papers that signaled their quizzes had been graded. A chorus of groans traveled through the room, with the exception of Daemon and him. They knew they totally aced it without even trying. Dawson picked up his pen, rolling it between long fingers and sighing. Tuesday was already shaping up to be another long day of boring classes. Some days were worse than others, but Dawson found his classmates made the experience more tolerable. He was like his sister in that way, a people person hidden in an alien body. Seconds before the bell rang, a girl hurried into class, clutching a yellow slip of paper in her hand. The fact she was in a sweater and not a heavy jacket when it was below thirty outside sort of gave it away. His gaze roamed down her legs—really nice, long, and curvy—to her thin flats. Handing over the paper to the teacher, she lifted her slightly sharp chin and gazed across the room. Holy crap, she was—she was beautiful. And he knew beautiful. Chocolate-colored hair slid over her shoulders as she kept scanning the room. Her skin held a healthy glow from being out in the sun a lot—recently, too, from the vibrancy of it. Finely groomed eyebrows set off tilted eyes framed with heavy lashes. Warm brown eyes connected with his, then his shoulder, and then she blinked several times as if trying to clear her vision.

Shadows (Lux #) PROLOGUE. A shadow glided over the frozen hills, moving too quick to likely be cast by something of this Earth.

Bought at BookOutlet, extra in Lux: Opposition Summary Provided by Goodreads: The last thing Dawson Black expected was Bethany Williams. As a Luxen, an alien life form on Earth, human girls are well, fun. But since the Luxen have to keep their true identities a secret, falling for one would be insane. Dawson is keeping a secret that will change her existence and put her life in jeopardy. Or from a fate that is as unavoidable as love itself. My Review This really breaks my heart, having to give this novella 2 stars but it must be done. Okay, I slept on this just to make sure that my rating was honest. So bad, that I will most likely rant. This novella is sorry for being harsh is the epitome of boring. I felt like I wasted a good 2 hours going through this. It was a short book, why did it take me two hours? There will be spoilers after the gif for Shadows, Obsidian, and Onyx. I read this after finishing the series. I thought that there would be more insight into everything. Yes, we finally learned what happened when Dawson healed her but it was very anticlimactic, again, boring. Along with that, I already created this image of Dawson and Beth. I envisioned and saw them as this amazing duo kickbutt fighters, with great lively personalities. However, I felt like it was the complete opposite. I felt like she barely stood up for herself. Dawson, this surprised me, was such a girl, a pansy! He was a girl with a penis, really. I really am because like I said, I loved Dawson and he was actually one of my favorites. Now not so much. Seriously, I felt like I was reading an alternate universe version of Obsidian. Beth was new girl like Katy and quickly caught the attention of one of the Black brothers. Then, Dawson was considering if he should really date her, everyone going against the relationship and insulting her, the whole shebang. There was no build up to their relationship. It was like one date, one long phone call, kiss, and I love you. Not only was that instalove atrocious, it was far from believable. No complaints, no apprehension, just complete acceptance. Throw me a freaking bone here! I never said that Daemon never put Katy first, because of course he did. I mean, he would literally worship the ground she walks on okay, maybe not literally. The only difference is that, they were together for a while before he was willing to put Katy over Dee. Dawson, on the other hand, was okay with the consequences and how it would negatively affect Daemon and Dee. Even when Daemon, gave him a semi-ultimatum between Beth and his siblings, Dawson, without skipping a beat, picked Beth. So much for the Luxen valuing family over everything right? At least with Daemon, in the beginning, did everything he could to protect Dee. Is that too much to ask from Dawson? Well, you can thank Daemon and Dee. They were the only parts the I enjoyed in the book. It explains not necessarily excuses his treatment of her in the beginning of Obsidian. I also liked the parts with Adam.

And that would be straight toward Dawson Black. Just thinking the name filled the back of his mouth with a metallic taste. The SOB had come like a druggie after his favorite fix. They always traveled in fours, and one of them had already been killed the night before, which left three more of the greasy bastards out there—and one was heading straight for him. Dawson stood and stretched out his muscles, then brushed the clumps of snow off his jeans. The Arum had come way too close to their home this time. The rocks were supposed to protect them, to throw off the unique wavelengths that set them apart from the humans, but the Arum had found them. Something had to be done. And that something was taking two of the three, which meant the remaining one would be a tad peeved. They wanted to play? Stalking out to the middle of the clearing, he welcomed the biting wind that brushed the hair off his forehead. It reminded him of being on the top of Seneca Rocks, staring out over the valley. It was always cold as crap up there. Eyes narrowing, he started to count down to ten. At five, he closed his eyes and let his human skin slip away, replaced by pure power—a light that pulsed with that bright sheen of blue. Shedding his human form was like taking off too-tight clothes and running naked. By the time he reached one, the Arum had crested the hill, speeding toward him like a bullet heading straight for a brain. Waiting until the last second, he darted to the side and spun, pulling forth the power the enemy coveted. The stuff was like a nuclear bomb in a bottle. Toss it and watch it go boom. He launched a nice bolt of it at the Arum, hitting what appeared to be his shoulder. In his true form, the Arum was nothing more than thick shadows that seeped oily arms and legs, but the rush of power connected with something. The impact spun the Arum around and as he came back, something pitch-black and slick shot toward Dawson. He dodged the missile. Burned like a bitch, but it would take a lot more jabs to bring down a Luxen. Give up, young one, the Arum taunted, rising in the dark sky. I promissse to make it painless. Dawson gave a mental eye roll. Sure the Arum would. As painless as eating the last ice cream in the house and facing down his sister. Darting across the clearing, he sent bolt after bolt of the good stuff at the Arum. The damn thing stayed up in the trees, the perfect camouflage. Well, he had a plan for that. Lifting arms encased in light, he smiled as the trees began to shake. A thundering groan echoed throughout the valley, and then the trees broke free from the ground. Shooting straight up into the sky, the trees had large clumps of dirt hanging from their chunky, snake-like roots. Spreading his arms wide, he threw the trees back, revealing the rat bastard. Gotcha, he shot back. He let loose another jolt of power and it raced across the space between them, hitting the Arum in the chest. Falling out of the sky like a torpedo, the Arum spun toward the ground, flashing in and out of his true form. Dawson caught a glimpse of leather pants and laughed. This weak excuse for an enemy was decked out like one of the Village People. He landed in a bumpy heap a few feet away, twitching for a couple of seconds and then going still. In his true form, the thing was huge. At least nine feet long and shaped like The Blob. And he smelled like metal? Dawson drifted over to check he was really dead before he headed back home. School was early. The Arum rose up. And man, did he get owned. A split second later, the Arum was on him like ugly on an ape. For a moment, Dawson lost his form and was back in his worn jeans and light sweater. Black strands of hand obscured his eyes as the shadow slipped over the ground at an alarming rate. He screamed for the first time in his life, really let loose like a pansy, but damn, the Arum got him. Like a match thrown on a pool of gasoline, fire swept through his body as the Arum drained him. His light—his very essence—flickered wildly, casting a whitish-blue halo onto the dark, bare branches overhead. The pain—it was everything, his whole being. Dying before he even knew what love really was. How it felt and tasted. This was so freaking unfair. Dammit, if he got out of here alive, he was going to really live. His wide eyes saw nothing. Then a faster, brighter light that burned a whitish-red lit up his entire world, shooting among the still-standing trees, coming at them faster than sound.
