Police investigating shooting in St. Catharines that sent three people to hospital Thursday. Phil Gavin said there were three gunshot victims taken to hospital: A third person was taken to a local hospital. Gavin said police believe the shooting was targeted. Witnesses on the scene say they heard shouting and yelling coming from the area of Niagara and Church Sts. As they made their way to the corner, they saw a victim on the ground. Police soon responded and removed all onlookers from the scene. Other emergency services arrived shortly after. Article Continued Below A heavy police presence continued late Thursday, with officers focusing their efforts on a home in the area. Catharines Standard reported that the home has been the scene of shootings and drug-related calls in the past. There are multiple crime scenes in the area, Niagara Regional Police spokesperson Phil Gavin said in a tweet. He added that uniformed officers, the emergency tactical unit, canine officers and others were all on scene. In the time following the shooting, police were asking members of the public to stay out of the area of Queenston St. They were allowed to return to their homes shortly after 11 p. One of the scenes being looked at in connection to the shooting was maintained by police overnight in order to search for forensic evidence. Niagara Police are still looking for two suspects, both black men in their early 20s. He was wearing earrings, a black shirt with white writing on the front and black shorts above the knees with white on the sides, and he had change in his pockets. He was wearing a black shirt and grey track pants. Both men are considered armed and dangerous, and police are warning the public not to approach them, but to call police instead. From Carlyle's last great pamphlet, Shooting Niagara: All the Millenniums I ever heard of heretofore were to be preceded by a "chaining of the Devil for a thousand years," "laying him up, tied neck and heels, and put beyond stirring, as the preliminary. You too have been taking preliminary.

Three things seem to be agreed upon by gods and men, at least by English men and gods; certain to happen, and are now in visible course of fulfilment. My own have not been wanting, any time these thirty years past, but they have not been of a joyful or triumphant nature; not prone to utter themselves; indeed expecting, till lately, that they might with propriety lie unuttered altogether. It was a clear prophecy, for instance, that Germany would either become honourably Prussian or go to gradual annihilation: That England would have to take the Niagara leap of completed Democracy one day, was also a plain prophecy, though uncertain as to time. The prophecy, truly, was plain enough this long while: It is indeed strange how prepossessions and delusions seize upon whole communities of men; no basis in the notion they have formed, yet everybody adopting it, everybody finding the whole world agree with him in it, and accept it as an axiom of [p. No wisest of mortals. Singular, in the case of human swarms, with what perfection of unanimity and quasi-religious conviction the stupidest absurdities can be received as axioms of Euclid, nay as articles of faith, which you are not only to believe, unless malignantly insane, but are if you have any honour or morality to push into practise, and qum primm see done if your soul would live! But you will in vain attempt, by argument of human intellect, to contradict or turn aside any of these divine axioms, indisputable as those of Euclid, and of sacred. Not even the Queen Bee but will then know what to think of them. Then, and never till then. By far the notablest result of Swarmery, in these times, is that of the late American War, with Settlement of the Nigger Question for result. Essentially the Nigger Question was one of the smallest; and in itself did not much concern mankind in the present time of struggles and hurries. The Almighty Maker has appointed him to be a Servant. The whole world rises in shrieks against you, on hearing of such a thing: Poor souls, and when they have [p. Servantship, like all solid contracts between men like wedlock itself, which was once nomadic enough, temporary enough! Mischief, irregularities, injustices, did probably abound between Nigger and Buckra; but the poisonous taproot of all mischief, and impossibility of fairness, humanity, or well-doing in the contract, never had been there! Papae, papae; wonderful indeed! In our own country, too, Swarmery has played a great part for many years past; and especially is now playing, in these very days and months. To the mind of here and there a man, it begins to be suspected that perhaps they are only conditionally true; that taken unconditionally, or under changed conditions, they are not true, but false and even disastrously and fatally so. Oh, my friends, whither are you buzzing and swarming, in this extremely absurd manner? You too have been taking preliminary steps, with more and more ardour, for a thirty years back; but they seem to be all in the opposite direction: So that now hardly any limb of the Devil has a thrum, or tatter of rope or leather left upon it: Bring in more voting; that will clear away the universal rottenness, and puddle of mendacities, in which poor England is drowning; let England only vote sufficiently, and all is clean and sweet again. A very singular swarmery this of the Reform movement, I must say. Does not all Nature groan everywhere, and lie in bondage, till you give it a Parliament? Is one a man at all unless one have a suffrage to Parliament? These are axioms admitted by all English creatures for the last two hundred years. For the last thirty years it has been growing more and more evident that there was only this issue; but now the issue itself has become imminent, the distance of it to be guessed by years. The sum of our sins, increasing steadily day by day, will at least be less, the sooner the settlement is! Perhaps the consummation may be now nearer than is thought. It seems to me sometimes as if everybody had privately now given up serious notion of resisting it. Those tears are certainly an epoch in England; nothing seen, or dreamt of, like them in the History of poor England till now. Lordship, if there is no written law that three and three shall be six, do you wonder at the Statute Book for that omission? You may shut those eloquent lips and go home to dinner. May your shadow never be less; greater it perhaps has little chance of being. Memorable considerably, and altogether new in our History, are both those ministerial feats; and both point significantly the same way. The perceptible, but as yet unacknowledged truth is, people are getting dimly sensible that our social affairs and arrangements, all but the money-safe, are pretty universally a Falsehood, an elaborate old-established Hypocrisy, which is even serving its own poor private purpose ill, and is openly mismanaging every public purpose or interest, to a shameful and indefensible extent. Safer to humour the mob than repress them, with the rope about your neck. Everybody sees the Official slinking off, has a secret fellow-feeling with it; nobody admires it; but the spoken diapproval is languid, and generally from the teeth outwards. Is it not a Hypocrisy and Humbug, as you yourselves well know? We demand to become Commonwealth of England; that will perhaps be better, worse it cannot be! From official persons, with the rope round their neck, should you expect a great amount? For we are a people drowned in Hypoc-[p. Who could regret the finis of such a thing; finis on any terms what- ever! Possibly it will not be death eternal, possibly only death temporal, death temporary. Practically the worthiest inquiry, in regard to all this, would be: And above all, what are the possibilities, resources, impediments, conceivable methods and attemptings of its ever getting out again? Let me avoid branch first of this inquiry altogether. It is not always the part of the infinitesimally small minority of wise men and good citizens to sit silent; idle they should never sit. Show us, show us, or else disappear! But from the maddest thing, as we said, there usually may come some particle of good withal if any poor particle of good did lie in it, waiting to be disengaged! And indeed, in spite of lamentable exceptions too visible all round, my vote would still be, That from Plebs to Princeps, there was still no Class among us intrinsically so valuable and recommendable. What the possibilities of our Aristocracy might still be? Surely their possibilities might still be considerable; though I confess they lie in a most abstruse, and as yet quite uninvestigated condition. Well, well let us at least do this, in our most perfect way! They are the grandest gifts a mortal can have; and they are of all, the most necessary to other mortals in this world. Good Heavens, these West-India Islands, some of them, appear to be the richest and most favoured spots on the Planet Earth. Jamaica is an angry subject, and I am shy to speak of it. Poor Dominica itself is described to me in a way to kindle a heroic young heart; look at Dominica for an instant: Hemispherical, they say, or in the shape of an Inverted Washbowl; rim of it, first twenty miles of it all round, starting from the sea, is flat alluvium, the fruitfullest in Nature, fit for any noblest spice or product, but unwholesome except for Niggers held steadily to their work: What a kingdom my poor Frederick William, followed by his Frederic, would have made of this Inverted Washbowl; clasped round, and lovingly kissed and laved, by the beautifullest seas in the world, and beshone by the grandest sun and sky! And the state your regulations have it in, at present, is: But to leave all this. I almost think, when once we have made the Niagara leap, the better kind of our Nobility, perhaps after experimenting, will more and more withdraw themselves from the Parliamentary, Oratorical or Political element; leaving that to such Cleon the [p. Speech, issuing in no deed, is hateful and contemptible: The English Nobleman has still left in him, after such sorrowful erosions, something considerable of chivalry and magnanimity; polite he is, in the finest form; politeness, modest, simple, veritable, ineradicable, dwells in him to the bone; I incline to call him the politest kind of nobleman or man especially his wife the politest and gracefulest kind of woman you will find in any country. An immense endowment this if you consider it well! A very great and indispensable help to whatever other faculties of kingship a man may have. Indeed it springs from them all its sources, every kingly faculty lying in you ; and is as the beautiful natural skin, and visible sanction, index, and outcome of them all. No king can rule without it; none but potential kings can really have it. This, though in itself a dreary and ignoble item, in respect of the revolutionary change, may nevertheless be for good, if the Few shall be really high and brave, as things roll on. It is all a peaceable mouldering or tumbling down from mere rottenness and decay; whether slowly mouldering or rapidly tumbling, there will be nothing found of real or true in the rubbish-heap, but a most true desire of making money easily, and of eating it pleasantly. And to such length have we at last brought it, by our wilful, conscious and now long-continued method of using varnish, instead of actual repair by honest carpentry, of what we all knew and saw to have gone undeniably wrong in our procedures and affairs! Method deliberately, steadily, and even solemnly continued, with much admiration of it from ourselves and others, as the best and only good one, for above two hundred years. This is called the constitutional System, Conservative System, and other fine names; and this at last has its fruits, such as we see. From a Population of that sunk kind, ardent only in pursuits that are low and industries that are sensuous and beaverish, there is little peril of human enthusiasms, or revolutionary transports, such as occurred in , for instance. A low-minden pecus all that; essentially torpid and ignavum, on all that is high or nobly human in revolutions. No help in them at all, to your model Aristocrat, or to any noble man or thing. But then likewise there is no hindrance, or a minimum of it! Nothing there in bar of the noble Few, who we al-[p. Yes, on them only! If amid the thickest welter of surrounding gluttony and baseness, and what must be reckoned bottomless anarchy from shore to shore, there be found no man, no small but invincible minority of men, capable of keeping themselves free from all that, and of living a heroically human life, while the millions round them are noisily living a mere beaverish or dog-like one, then truly all hope is gone. But we always struggle to believe Not. Aristocracy by title, by fortune, and position, who can doubt but there are still precious possibilities among the chosen of that class? How many of our Titular Aristocracy will prove real gold when thrown into the crucible? That is always a highly interesting question to me; and my answer or guess has still something considerable of hope lurking in it. But the question as to our Aristocracy by Patent from God the Maker, is infinitely interesting. How many of these, amid the ever-increasing bewilderments, and welter of impediments, will be able to develop themselves into something of Heroic Well-doing by act and by word? How many, by their too desperate resistance to the unanimous vulgar of a Public round them, will become spasmodic instead of strong; and will be overset, and trodden out, under the hoofs and hobnails above-said? But considering what of Piety, the devoutest and the bravest yet known, there once was in England, and how extensively, in stupid, maundering and degraded forms, it still lingers, one is inclined timidly to hope the best! Our heart abhors all this; our soul is. Behold we will all die rather than that this last. What we can expect this Aristocracy of Nature to do for us? They are of two kinds: These are of brother quality; but they go very different roads: This Industrial hero, here and there recognisable, and known to me, as developing himself, and as an opulent and dignified kind of man, is already almost an Aristocrat by class. He cannot do better than unite with this naturally noble kind of Aristocrat by title; the Industrial noble and this one are brothers- born; called and impelled to co-operate and go together.
