"Short stories have always been the Irish forte Now this realm has been inherited by dozens of fine women writers Three or four stories are worth this book on their own, and several moved me to tears"of laughter as well as of pain."

Share via Email Social commentator Maria Edgeworth, circa The phrase captures the brevity and epiphany of the form and some of the best practitioners " from Chekhov to Lorrie Moore, Katherine Mansfield to Kevin Barry " have fired it into unfamiliar places, soaring over a multitude of themes and ideas. In the late s, while studying English at university, I took a course on the Irish short story. We had another mandatory course on literary theory and " hurrah! Almost every collection was edited by a man, and each book I opened " including anthologies from all around the world " was heavily weighted towards male writers. Irish offerings were no different: Looking at the lack of women represented in anthologies over the decades, women could have been included as just such a fringe group. Then in , I discovered Cutting the Night in Two: Short Stories by Irish Women Writers. Edited by Evelyn Conlon and Hans-Christian Oeser, it featured 34 writers, living and dead " but all female. It proved a point that those library anthologies missed: Maria Edgeworth was well known for her fiction as well as her social commentary, and Charlotte Riddell published more than 50 books, including many short stories. They all feel the pragmatic pull of the novel, but are still committed to the shorter form. Several factors ultimately went into the selection of the final 30 stories. I could have chosen women, but my publisher was understandably stubborn about the page count. All work by the 22 living writers is new and unpublished: For it is a long arc: In some ways this anthology is a triptych: There are overlaps and patterns, as well as a faithfulness to the canon that came before, and a desire to map new places. An anthology is a cultural snapshot, and a book must have an endpoint, which is difficult when sharp new voices " Sara Baume , Danielle McLaughlin " keep announcing themselves.
