Seeing him included in Marvel vs. Capcom 3 had me stoked. The two are just checking in, but are also a bit afraid that Haggar is burning the candle at both ends. Is he President of both versions of the US? Did Stark just make the switch? Is this a separate Tony Stark from the Capcom world? Either way, I fully support this ticket. After years of being the bland never-loses hero of the Mortal Kombat series, they first killed him off, then turned him into a shambling zombie, then did that non-canon thing where Raiden turned him into Captain Marvel and then found a more permanent fix with the latest Mortal Kombat game. Especially when Kitana is killed off. The status is decided via a duel and Liu Kang wins, presumably killing Raiden. He kills Shao Kahn and takes all of the souls Kahn has devoured. Master Cho can teach Shang to control his powers and master the souls that are currently tearing him apart. In return, he needs to take care of Liu Kang. Ever since becoming a god, Liu has become a total tyrant and needs stopping. Shang is seen as the lesser of two evils and goes through rigorous training to save Earthrealm via getting his revenge. Ryo or Robert beats up Mr. Karate and saves Yuri. The SNES version of the game goes on far longer and gives us some details. Then Geese Howard "main villain of the Fatal Fury series" came up to him and offered to pay those debts for some assistance. He wore the Mr. Karate mask out of shame and did a lot of dirty work for him, but with this confession came a sweet bombshell. Takuma Sakazaki killed Jeff Bogard. Karate do it for him. Unfortunately, nothing ever came of this. So Geese killed him after all. The rest of the ending has Takuma begging for forgiveness and being granted it by his children. He bestows the title of master to Ryo and then goes off to start his own dojo. For years, he saw Sagat as the unbeatable top dog and never acted out on his jealousy because how can you challenge a guy who you see as infallible? From there, Adon did away with his hero worship and decided that it was time for him to become the true legend of Muay Thai. Adon demands to know who did it. Adon knows who the man speaks of. Akuma mastered the style that Ryu used to defeat Sagat. We see a montage of the two riding through Las Vegas and all the different attractions. They return home and Forest shows his father that his wallet is now empty. Marshall does not take this news well. Flash back a week earlier, where we see why Forest came back empty-handed. Right before he and Paul could make it to Vegas, they saw a family whose house had burned down. They lost everything and the two martial artists have to decide: Forest convinces Paul to do the right thing and they give away all their money. The hell kind of house needs a hundred billion to be fixed? Has the American dollar really fallen that far? Either way, Sophitia has to protect the Soul Edge by destroying its rival sword. She defeats Algol and gets ready to do the deed. She picks up Soul Edge and knows that if she destroys Soul Calibur with it, her family will be safe. Sophitia realizes from his words that Algol is a father himself, but he dismisses her. Even with all this power, I cannot undo the past. She does so, living her days in happiness. He seeks out both the Soul Edge and Soul Calibur, since the two super-powerful swords have to be able to end his suffering. In his bad ending, he uses the two weapons for a ritual, but finds that nothing has changed. He deliriously starts laughing in defeat and collapses, accepting that he will have to live out this pointless existence forever. If you get the good ending, he does succeed in removing the curse. He wonders about what to do with the rest of his mortal life and decides to write his memoirs. He writes the HELL out of those memoirs! Once finished, he merely waits for time to take him to his eternal rest. While all but Sub-Zero appear unmasked during their Fatalities, the endings also feature their true faces, bringing us revelations about the characters. We see that Sub-Zero is just an Asian dude. Scorpion has a skull head and Reptile is a literal reptile. What followed was 20 years of fellatio jokes from the gamer crowd. There are alternate timelines, reboots, retcons and all sorts of pitfalls. Look no further than this epilogue to Marvel vs. Capcom 3 where the Silver Surfer tries to give Zero a lift home. Zero continues to thank and apologize. Kazuya is able to keep eating while taking a second to snicker at his foolish half-brother. Lars suddenly wakes up on a helicopter with his task force. He describes what just happened as a nightmare and after a beat, wonders if anyone has any food on them. Quan-Chi uses his powers of necromancy to build up their own army and has little trouble getting recruits due to how many strong warriors died during the course of the Outworld invasion. Shinnok then falls into type and betrays Quan-Chi. Despite all that Quan-Chi did for him, Shinnok orders his execution so that nobody can challenge his rule. Quan-Chi is angered, but he expected this. What does Quan-Chi do? Resurrects the dead via sorcery and make them his slaves. Who did he recently make dead? Not just boring, but redundant. Storywise, he is exactly the same as Cammy, just without the male gaze. A blond-haired, scar-faced clone of M. Bison with memory issues who was taken in by a military group. Abel wins me over a bit in his Street Fighter x Tekken storyline with Guile. Abel demands that if they win, they get Kuma. Guile is not amused. Much respect for that. Then you get to the ending. It opens up and a huge light shines straight up into a UFO. He and his family get accustomed to their new life in the spotlight and while Guile is okay with that, he insists that he will never work with another person on a mission as long as he lives. Rare had a cool idea of mixing the two together. What if killing your opponent " or not killing your opponent " had repercussions? Everyone had endings based on the pulse of certain opponents. The best use of this was Orchid, whose fate is tied with Jago and Sabrewulf. His soul jumps into Sabrewulf as a last-ditch attack and goes for Orchid. Luckily, her brother is there to slay the beast. If you were to have killed Jago and not Sabrewulf, Orchid would end up being torn to ribbons. Kill them both and Orchid returns home, depressed over the death of the brother she never knew. Kill just Sabrewulf and it emphasizes that she and Jago are reunited and an unbeatable fighting team has been formed. I wish we could have seen this gimmick used more often. On the subject of Killer Instinct 2 endings, someone had hacked into the game to find out that there were even more endings made that were never made available, all based on interacting with the backgrounds. This is why some characters like Spinal and Maya only have two endings. Then he thinks about the look he sees in their eyes. Hyo collapses, complaining about a headache. Some kind of emotional screaming from within. Hyo is broken over the idea that Kyosuke not only refused to join him, but outright rose against him.
