My exposure to the Czech Republic has been limited over the years. Friends in the banking industry suggest that a lot of the women there are incredibly hot looking and the people are really nice but admit upon closer scrutiny that they are mainly familiar with the larger urban areas of the country that cater to businessmen and their observations may not be as accurate for the smaller towns that populate the region. Well, thanks to Film Movement , I got to see one of the most awarded movies from the country ever made in the form of Something Like Happiness Stesti this week, providing a glimpse into mundane life in the country. Something Like Happiness is a story about three people and those around them that were originally childhood friends but have grown apart over time. Monika sees her lover go off to the USA as he pursues his dream of financial success; leaving her behind. While this is not the comprehensive version of what takes place, it gives you a feel for the soap opera nature of the events in the movie. The bitter realities of life creeping up on people and things not going the way we plan them is a common theme in cinematic history, this one winning scores of independent film festival awards as well as most of the Czech Lion Awards their version of the Oscars when it came out. Is it a comedy that will elicit belly laughs? Heck no, although there were numerous tender moments that poked fun at a great many aspects of life that would translate to most societies in other parts of the world too. Was it a horror flick? No, although I would again suggest that there were some parts that reached deep down and grabbed me as frightening in how they applied to people I knew awhile back multiple kids, the father gone, and the mental breakdown that ensued. The best way I can describe the movie would be to rely on the drama category, saying that with all the subtle and not so subtle heartstrings it pulled, this is where the majority of the movie landed. Director Bohdan Slama showed the world that life in many parts of the world has certain commonalities, that we are indeed very much alike, despite our political, geographic, and cultural differences. The dark, dirty industrial town was not whitewashed and the flawed characters were as real as one could expect, lending an air of authenticity to the movie that many will find refreshing. It was not escapist action fare with special effects, car chases, and lots of blood flying everywhere; just a small little movie about some friends that had seen brighter times and happier days making the most of their lots in life. I think that serious aficionados of foreign film will want to see this more than anyone else, so try it as a Rent It first unless you already subscribe to the Film Movement series and get it dirt cheap. Something Like Happiness was shot on 35mm film with an aspect ratio of 2. It had a fair amount of grain and some minor issues but generally looked a lot better than most small budget titles shot in second world countries seem to do, the camera taking an almost home movie approach as director Slama went for a more intimate look into the lives he was capturing. This allowed for him to take the movie right into the homes where it probably works better than in an art house theatre unlike some movies that work better in a crowd. If you like sentimental movies, this should definitely be on your short list this year. The audio was presented in 2. There was no separation to speak of and the dynamic range was limited at best but this claustrophobic manner of using the audio worked well with the type of visuals and themes displayed in the movie. There was a double sided DVD cover and some trailers, as well as biographies of the director and lead actors as usual but the best extra was the short film the company includes in all of their releases. Something Like Happiness was the year 4, volume 11 title of the Film Movement series. It served to show that life has a lot of ups and downs of our own making as well as that which is thrust upon us by circumstance so we need to make the best out of what we have to work with and not wallow in despair.
