Are no other sitters in NYC? Claudia, Kristy, Dawn and Mary Anne arrive and get hopelessly lost at Grand Central Station, making me wonder just how small a country town Stoneybrook really is. The suitcase was on little wheels. I wanted to die. Only grandmothers pull around suitcases on wheels. Dawn is all flighty and panic-stricken, and Kristy who seems ready and waiting to have a go at Dawn â€” nervous habit, Kristy? We lived outside Anaheim â€” in this teeny little suburbâ€”But last night? I was listening to the news and I heard about these two murders in New York, and then this building collapsed and crushed someone. Or maybe we could go to South Street Seaport, located in the Wall Street area of lower Manhattan and featuring nineteenth-century buildings, three piers, and a maritime museum. Is that in a safe neighborhood? They do head to the Hard Rock Cafe, with the four visitors being loud and touristy the whole time, finishing their lunch by buying everyone they know and themselves matching Hard Rock Cafe T-shirts. I looked around for a place to hide, but there was none. So did I, Stacey. The next thing I knew, this store detective had come after Mary Anne. He demanded to look in her purse. When she opened it, he pulled out a half-used jar of eye shadow. Everyone was looking at us. The man was very nice and let us go, saying not to let it happen again. He was four-fifths right. Thus we arrive at the important topic of what to wear to a New York party. This is New York. I want us to dress New York so we fit in. You wear what Stacey says. And she was wearing her hair simply, for once â€” brushed back from her face and held in place by a white beaded headband. Claudia has incredible clothes. And I wanted her to wear this outfit that was sleek and black and covered with silver stars and sparkles. Kristy was wearing a white turtleneck with little red and blue hearts all over it, a red sweater, jeans, and sneakers. Dawn had chosen and oversized peach-colored sweater-dress, lacy white stockings, and black ballet slippers. I was wearing a short, short yellow dress that flared out just above my hips, white stockings, yellow push-down socks, and these new shoes that my parents hate. Laine was beyond chic. She had chosen a short black dress, black stockings, and simple black flats. On one wrist was a single silver bangle bracelet. On her dress was one of those silver squiggle pins. I looked at her, aghast. The party goesâ€”swimmingly only, the opposite of swimmingly. Mary Anne embarrasses everyone including the reader by recalling facts about New York to groups of people she just wanders up to. Until Stacey makes them. She leads Kristy over to a guy called Coby Reese â€” and, amazingly, they hit it off naturally, they have sports in common. Dawn opens her mouth once to ask a girl called Read okie dokie where the fire escape is. Which ends up being, in true Mary Anne bitch fashion, making fun of Dawn being afraid of everything. After her snipe attack on Laine, we hear nothing from her. That is, until she sees that Kristy is actually having a good time at the party. At least one of the Connecticut girls was fitting in with my other friends. A fast song ended and a slow one started. If looks could kill, Claudia would have been dead and buried. The party ends, and everyone except the BSC and Laine leaves. The girls agree that they want Laine to stay â€” with the exception of Claudia, who sullenly remains silent when directly asked.

This book is in honor of the birth of my new godson, Andrew Cleveland Gordon. Can we go to bloom blume that big huge depratment store. And lets go to some art musims or at least one. Claudia It could only happen in New York. Only in New York could you be sitting in the middle of your absolutely gorgeous blue-and-white bedroom reading a postcard, and see a gigantic roach sneak out from behind the dresser and have the nerve to run right across the rug and disappear under the closet door. In any other place, a roach would have the good sense to stick to yucky places like laundry rooms or greasy kitchens. But in New York, they get all bold and start invading bedrooms. My first thought, after he disappeared into the closet was, Oh, disgust. Now do I have to go look for him? A roach would freak them out. I left the roach alone in the closet. No way was I going after him. You must be pretty confused by now, so I better give you the background to this story. For starters, I am Stacey McGill. The five of us had this neat business called the Baby-sitters Club. But after only a year well, a year and a couple of months in Stoneybrook, my mom and dad and I moved back to New York. Believe me, I really minded the idea of leaving my new friends, but I was thrilled to be getting back to such a bustling, busy place. I love people and stores and shopping and museums and restaurants and theaters. Stoneybrook is a very pretty little place with nice people, but if you want excitement, you have to drive all the way to Washington Mall, outside of Stamford, which just does not live up to Fifth Avenue. Claudia and I had just been starting to talk about my visiting Stoneybrook for a weekend, when something happened. The something was Judy. Some people call her a bag lady. Just where in New York do I live? Well, I live in a very nice neighborhood on the Upper West Side. As I said before, New York roaches live everywhere " and lately, so do homeless people. Homelessness is a serious problem in New York. There are thousands and thousands of people like Judy. Some of them live in shelters or welfare hotels, some live in subway stations or railroad stations, and some actually live on the street. Judy is one of the ones who actually live on the street. She sleeps in doorways or on top of grates where warm air blows up from the subway. She gets her food from garbage cans or begs for handouts. It is not a nice life. I see Judy at least twice a day when I go back and forth between my nice, comfortable, doorman apartment building and my nice, comfortable private school , and I have an idea of what her life is like. What I see when I see Judy is a woman who looks a lot older than she really is. And I mean, she hangs onto empty tin cans, bottle caps, newspapers, and used plastic cups. She carries her stuff around in old, wrinkled, falling-apart shopping bags. I see a woman who is almost always hungry, who has huge sores on her legs, whose hair is matted, and whose face and hands are permanently red from being exposed to the sun, wind, heat, and cold. When Judy is in a good mood, we smile and say hello to each other. Judy calls me Missy. Judy will stand on the sidewalk and just shout stuff for hours. She screams and yells, then finally she quiets down and mumbles crossly. The people on our block who see and hear Judy everyday began to get worried about her. They decided that it was time for them, plain old ordinary citizens, to see what they could do to help Judy and other homeless people in the neighborhood. So they organized a big meeting that was to be held for an entire Saturday afternoon. Most of the adults in my building including Mom and Dad were eager to go. Which meant that a lot of kids were going to need baby-sitters. Remember the Baby-sitters Club I belonged to in Stoneybrook? On the one hand, this is nice, because there are plenty of little kids in my building, so I get lots of jobs. Besides, I miss the meetings our club used to hold. Well, anyway, a total of five parents called up a whole month in advance to ask me to baby-sit on the afternoon of the big meeting. I felt bad about turning four of the families down, especially when the parents were all going to be at the same place for the same time. If only " And that was when I got my brilliant idea. I ran into our kitchen. As New York apartments go, ours is fairly large. The due that you have a large apartment is if you can actually eat in your kitchen. And our kitchen had room for a table and chairs. That was where I found my mom " seated at the table. She was paying bills. I sat down across from her. I explained the baby-sitting situation. All in all, there are ten kids in the five families that asked me to sit. If my friends were here, we could easily take care of the kids for just one afternoon. They could stay for the weekend. What do you think? In a way it will help Judy. I gave her a kiss. Then I waited for Dad to come home from work. I pounced on him the second he stepped through the door. Dad adjusted his glasses. They told me I could take Friday off from school that weekend. Then my parents even suggested that I give a party on Friday night so that my Connecticut friends could meet my New York friends. What a weekend the five of us would have — three days in the city, a party, and a baby-sitting adventure. Claudia and I called and wrote constantly as the weekend approached. Once I saw someone dressed as Batman. What will your friends wear to the party? Claudia has incredible clothes. And I wanted her to wear this outfit that was sleek and black and covered with silver stars and sparkles. How can I wait two weeks? I was dying of excitement myself. But the two weeks passed — somehow — and finally it was Friday morning, and time for me to get in a cab and meet my friends at Grand Central Station.

3: BSC Chronologically: #18 Stacey's Mistake

The book Stacey's Mistake is about when the Baby Sitters Club in Stoneybrook, Connecticut comes to visit Stacey in New York. They come to help her baby sit a group of ten kids in her apartment building, so the parents can go to a meeting to help a homeless woman named Judy and other homeless people.

Quite a few of them ask Stacey to watch their kids during the meeting, and she feels bad that she has to turn most of them down. The visit gets off to a rocky start, though. When she does, Stacey realizes that they look like They make a big fuss over how cool the place is, which embarrasses Stacey, and Kristy orders fill-it-mig-nun. Laine Cummings arrives early looking 19 to help set up for the party, and she and Claudia definitely get off to a bad start. To be fair, Claudia started the snide comments. She first bugs the snot out of everyone by reciting her New York facts, and then entertains them by describing how terrified Dawn is of everything. By the end of the evening, Dawn is mad at Mary Anne, Kristy is mad at Claudia, Claudia hates Laine, and Laine decides to go home rather than spend the night. Stacey calls a truce for the next day, to get them through the sitting job. They collect the ten kids midmorning, and head to the Natural History Museum. After lunch in the museum restaurant, they head to Central Park. Later that afternoon, Laine calls. She wants to try again with the BSC especially Claudia, and invites them out to dinner and a Broadway show. The night ends up a success, and Laine and Claudia become friends. They exchange addresses as the limo is dropping the sitters off at the end of the night. The sitters leave the next day, after a breakfast of bagels with lox and cream cheese. That sounds really good right now I hate to admit it, but I felt for Stacey a little at the beginning of the book when the rest of the club was being all loud and dorky. Grace Walker looks really cute on the cover. There are department stores in CT. At least one of them must have a makeup counter; Mary Anne totally should have known not to take that eye shadow!
