The Man Who Never Missed concerns an ex-soldier Emile Khadaji, formerly in the service of the "Confed", a generic star-spanning empire formerly a confederacy, hence the name of solar systems. The Confed has grown large and old, and to maintain its fading grip on power, uses its powerful military to brutally suppress any resistance and to colonialize further worlds. During one such campaign which results in the slaughter of three-quarters of a million people in a single pitched battle, Khadaji snaps and deserts while experiencing a religious epiphany which instills him the belief that taking the lives of sapient beings is wrong and that the Confed must be overthrown. He escapes and is believed dead by his military superiors. While wandering in the nearby city and pondering his experience, the young Khadaji runs into the mysterious priest "Pen" Pen being not his real name but rather his title; as the current Pen, Pen goes about enshrouded such that his flesh cannot be seen, of the order of the Siblings of the Shroud. Pen also teaches Khadaji the surprisingly complex craft of bartending to the many worlds of the Confed. While working as a bartender on the world of Rim, Khadaji falls in love with an "exotic" albino—exotic is the term Perry uses for descendants of humans genetically engineered to be sexually attractive, to exude sex pheromones, and to have an extremely high libido. Eventually he realizes the extent to which she cheats on him and how she views his martial arts skills as a useful way to protect herself from lustful males. Khadaji comes to the conclusion that he needs to further his war against the Confed, but bartending on Rim was wasting time. At this point, Pen and Khadaji part ways after a relationship encompassing years. Travelling to a college planet, Khadaji begins learning economics and politics and military science. While there, he masters the nonlethal civilian weapon: Within 20 meters, it is described as being an extremely fast and precise weapon—pointshooting taken to its logical conclusion. With his weapon and target chosen, Khadaji carefully embarks on a large-scale and careful career of smuggling—a career chosen for its ability to garner large sums of money which Khadaji needs and because it does not necessarily compromise his ethics; Khadaji reasons that as long as he does not transport health-compromising narcotics, his will be victimless crimes. Eventually, he decides to test his skills against the best living opponents he can find, in real life-or-death situations: He considered where he could get such experience. Or, there was The Maze. Such a thing was risky, but it offered a real test. Injury was likely, death a possibility in the game known as The Maze; if he could survive that, maybe he would be ready The Maze mentioned is a multiple-day unarmed combat tournament set in a ruined city; the last person conscious wins an extremely large monetary prize. No rules other than not interfering with the medical robots rescuing a downed contestant, and not bringing any weapons with one into the tournament, are observed. Khadaji wins, and is convinced to launch his war. This he does by buying and fortifying a bar on the recently occupied planet Greaves. While luring soldiers into his bar by day, Khadaji hunts and paralyzes them with a potent cocktail of drugs which induces total paralysis by night; the cocktail does not kill, but requires enormous sums of money and at least six months to cure. Over many months, he paralyzes 2, of the 10, troops on the planet, only missing with a handful of shots, which he carefully conceals. His guerilla tactics are so successful that the Confed forces estimate the "Shamba Freedom Forces" or the "Shamba Scum" as the Confed calls them to have hundreds of members. Eventually, he learns that his six months are about to lapse: So Khadaji goes for broke. He calls the head commander of the Confed forces and reveals that he has learned the identity of the leaders of the Shamba Freedom Forces. There he spends an hour meditating on his past and his life; in this flashback his history is revealed to the reader—the novel started in medias res. The army catches up to Khadaji. His vault is proof against most of their weapons; the officer tasked with his apprehension orders an "implosion" possibly a miniature black hole bomb fired against the safe. It, and presumably Khadaji, are compressed into a tiny lump; Khadaji is presumed dead, although the Confed forensics can only conclude that there was a human body in the remains, and not that the remains were of Khadaji. Mysteriously, shortly before the implosion round is fired, Perry writes of Khadaji handling a heavy, large, and secured package stored in the vault for the last six months. Afterwards, the Confederation military realize that he apparently knocked out almost 2, soldiers without missing a single time, a record which quickly becomes a legend, striking fear into the Confederation military ranks.

MATADORA () This is second book in the series called Matador (See my Listmania) by Steve Perry. Dirisha Zuri was introduced in The Man Who Never Missedd as a bouncer at the Jade Flower, the bar, where she met Khadaji.

The books have been published out of chronological order, and over a number of years, but in chronological order they are: The Musashi Flex Prequel to the entire series. The Omega Cage The 97th Step A thief who loses everything, including himself, and then is inducted into a mysterious priesthood called the Siblings of the Shroud. Prequel to the Khadaji trilogy. The Man Who Never Missed The debut for the series. Picks up where The 97th Step ended, following Khadaji as he learns what he needs to know to start the fall of The Confed. The story of The Matadors, trained as bodyguards, but destined to be leaders of the revolution. The Machiavelli Interface The Albino Knife The Confed has fallen, but mysterious accidents keep happening. His best hope of survival is Kildee Wu, a master of the sword looking for a worthy student. People are being killed inside locked and guarded rooms, and nobody can figure out how. Tazzimi Bork gets stuck with solving the murders, and their links to a twisted cult lead by a man named Brother Death. This series provides examples of: The Zonn, who have been gone for millions of years, but left some interesting ruins scattered around various planets. As Dain Maro discovers in The Omega Cage, their walls are actually stable energy fields, and one can pass through them with the right equipment. They also form a major part of the plot of Brother Death. The robot that delivers their meals has an annoying alarm that has to be manually deactivated, to make sure they stop working and eat. The named character is the focal character of the book. You aim by pointing your index finger at what you want to hit. Dirisha Zuri, who believes that love makes you weak, is sent to be a bodyguard for Rajeem Carlos. She falls hard for him, and eventually ends up in a relationship with him and his wife. Pen or rather, Khadaji as Pen set her up with him intentionally, because she needed to learn what love is in order to be the best possible bodyguard. Khadaji and Pen also both worked as bouncers at various times in their lives. The Albino Knife deals with his attempts to reverse the process, and put himself back into a human body. At Matador Villa the rules instruct you to be armed at all times, even in the shower because other trainees can and will attack you there. The obvious problem with washing the backs of your hands is noted: How the leader of the Musashi Flex is determined. Anyone ranked in the top ten can challenge the current number one, and if they win, they take that position, regardless of their previous rank. The Third Rule of Matador Villa: The blurb on the back cover of The Albino Knife has nothing whatsoever to do with the book. Marcus Wall becomes this in The Albino Knife. His extra power just makes him more sadistic and unhinged, wreaking havoc across the galaxy as well as drawing his enemies into a trap. Earth Is the Center of the Universe: Earth is the Confederation capital, and a majority of their bureaucracy is headquartered there. The 97 Steps, or Sumito, are the style that the Siblings of the Shroud practice, and which is taught to the characters of the series. The Musashi Flex shows us its origins. Also oppugnate, a military-derived mixed martial art fusing elements of boxing with the best bits of several other arts. Boxcars are sub-orbital, used for longer distances. Saval Bork, and his sister Tazzimi. Bad-ass revolutionary Sleel is caught browsing the philosophy section of a bookstore, quotes poetry, and spots a deception that nobody else had ever seen through. This tends to make the victim look like a contortionist. Mues are humans genetically modified to be more suitable for certain tasks, such as working on worlds with higher than Earth-normal gravity. There are also the Albino Exotics, created as sexual playthings for the wealthy. The caption on the page image is a paraphrase of something he said to a Confed officer in The Machiavelli Interface when queried on this. Pen teaches Khadaji Pubtending alongside his Sumito lessons, both for its practicality A good pubtender is always in demand across the galaxy and this trope: Ah, but it is a perfect job for a priest, even one so un-priestly as I. More than one pubtender has come from the ranks of practicing psychologists-or gone there from some bar. Kinetic Weapons Are Just Better: Hand-held energy weapons are rare, and most people are armed with various projectile weapons, often with explosive or chemically-treated ammunition. We stand until the last man falls. The Siblings of the Shroud are a largely pacifist order. Your flitter is likely to have a mysterious engine failure and crash in the middle of the ocean. The stories are set somewhere around, but things are still measured in meters. Pretty common in the series. For starters Emile Antoon Khadaji has French-derived first and middle names and an Arabic-sounding last name it seems to be a corruption of "Khadijah", an Arabic feminine given name, suggesting he may be partly of Moroccan Arab descent. Marcus Jefferson Wall is the most powerful man in the Confed political establishment, the power behind the throne. Not Safe for Work: Well-described sex scenes happen at least once a book, although The Musashi Flex is noticeably tamer. Only when the first of his victims comes out of the coma does he reveal himself to the local garrison commander. And then darts him with Spasm for good measure. Powerful computers are some sort of artificial brain, and custom-tailored viruses are used to teach people things quickly. Outgrown Such Silly Superstitions: Most of the main characters follow some variant of Zen, and Christianity is still very common. Marcus Wall, the Big Bad of the Khadaji trilogy and The Albino Knife, likes to sleep with pubescent girls in addition to his other endearing qualities, so much so that Confed politicians have been known to offer their female relatives in return for his favor. He gets very cross when he discovers one such favor to be an adult courtesan who has chosen to specialize in servicing pedophiles and has herself on anti-aging treatments, and gets his revenge by sentencing her to death by accelerated aging. Khadaji uses her to assassinate him with poison gas. Dirisha Zuri ends up in a relationship with her first client Rajeem Carlos and his wife, plus her female lover from the Matador academy, Geneva. Veate, the daughter of Khadaji and Juete, an Albino Exotic. The Albinos were genetically created to be preternaturally sexually attractive. Very few escape working in the sex trade. Khadaji gave Juete the resources to live her life independently, and she raised her daughter accordingly. Like Veate, his mother was an Albino Exotic. Deadly accurate, and deadly for Albino Exotics, as noted in Human Subspecies: Those who survive generally do so by finding a powerful "protector". All over the place in Black Steel. Kildee Wu and Cierro are masters of the sword, and Sleel learns to use one quite effectively as well. The Matador school has a room with a holographic projection system, used for practicing various bodyguarding scenarios. Khadaji also uses a similar system to train for his attacks against the Confed. He still tries to get their approval when he visits them during the course of the book. He always was persistent. Saval Bork is presented as the strongest recorded man in the known universe. Until Brother Death, where we meet brother Mkono, an assassin even bigger and stronger than Bork.
