Robin was desperate to have a child, but her husband of 17 years, Scott Mansfield, had other ideas. After failing to persuade Scott to start a family with her, he had a vasectomy, rocking their marriage to the core. Robin began to re-evaluate her life. But as she grew older, she began to wonder about the passion she had missed out on in her 20s and 30s. With the sudden realisation that she was never going to be a mother, Robin decided she would need to find fulfilment in another way. The rules were simple – no falling in love, no sleeping with mutual friends, and no unsafe sex. She placed an advert on a dating site, choosing her words carefully: Our time together will be limited to three dates, as I cannot become seriously involved. Facebook Within 24 hours, her inbox was full of messages from prospective suitors, mostly men much younger than her. Come what may, I would be ravished, and then they could leave. I wanted their smells, their grasping hands and hungry mouths. The more maleness I had, the more female I could be. Their open relationship received mixed reactions from friends – some seemed concerned, while others admired their bravery. The men Robin dated came from all different backgrounds: The only time the three-date-rule was broken was when she met Alden, a writer in his 30s. They began to fall for one another in a serious way, so they cut off all contact. Her new-found love life was thrilling and empowering. Why had no one ever mentioned the satisfaction of being useful, of sharing pleasure and sustenance through my body? But by Monday morning, I was ready to return to work and my rotation of lovers. It was the food, music, conversation – the intimate glimpse into another person. Robin Rinaldi on This Morning Image: ITV Gone was the paralysing lack of self-worth she had felt every time she took off her clothes. At 44, she had never felt so comfortable in her own skin. For a month, she moved into an Orgasmic Meditation commune. It was here she bedded a woman, and had a threesome. Finally, the project came to an end and Robin returned home full-time. But the adjustment was hard, and she was angry when she discovered Scott had been having an exclusive relationship with a younger woman for most of the time. She reconnected with Alden, and the pair fell head-over-heels in love. Robin and Scott split amicably, but are still close. So would she have done anything differently?
