The teenagers were called Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold, and their school was Columbine High, an idyllic sounding place nestled between the Denver metropolitan area and the foothills of the Rocky Mountains. What is indisputable is that Columbine quickly became a byword for the nightmarish phenomenon - now seemingly a worldwide contagion - of school shootings. Harris and Klebold did not just gun down their victims in cold blood. They laughed and hollered while they were doing it, as though they were having the time of their lives. Denver television crews got there while the horrors were unfolding, and the cameras did not stop rolling for a week. That, in retrospect, may not have been an entirely good thing. From the start, the images seemed to suck viewers right into the heart of the mayhem. One of the dead was left stranded in a parking lot, which terrified fellow students would eventually have to pass as they ran out at the end of their ordeal. The cameras captured it all. Another victim, already badly wounded in the head, arm and legs but seized by a compulsion to get out of the school at any cost, somehow pirouetted his broken body across a window ledge and let himself tumble into the arms of two waiting officers. That, too, was broadcast live on international television. What we were seeing, though, was not quite what we thought. By the time the TV crews arrived, Harris and Klebold had in fact ended their rampage and turned their weapons on themselves. The sporadic shooting heard over the next three hours over the incessant wah-wah of the fire alarm came, in fact, from Swat teams pumping bullets into locked classroom doors in a painfully slow and clumsy effort to track down the killers. Only later did the authorities realise Harris and Klebold were already lying dead in the library, along with 10 of their 13 murder victims. The illusion of an ordeal lasting for hours - some television stations even described it as a hostage stand-off - was just the first of many misconceptions. Harris and Klebold, we were told, were members of a campus group of losers and Marilyn Manson-worshipping goths called the Trenchcoat Mafia, who had few friends and attracted only derision from the cool kids. Supposedly, they also had a grudge against evangelical Christians. A story soon spread that one of the murder victims in the library, Cassie Bernall, had been asked at gunpoint if she believed in God. When she answered yes, Harris laughed and pulled the trigger. Those of us who covered the shootings repeated at least some of these stories. We had no reason not to. They were confirmed, if not amplified, by the Jefferson County officials who gave news briefings several times a day. How were we to know that John Stone, the county sheriff, was winging it, telling us, for example, that the boys had fully automatic weapons and at least one accomplice, when these were no more than his own wrongheaded assumptions? The stories were repeated, too, by traumatised students who drifted towards the television cameras stationed in a park across the street from the school. We could not guess that these students did not know Harris and Klebold - this was a school with 2, students - and were, to a large extent, repeating things they were themselves picking up from the television coverage. I had long conversations with local teenagers, both in the park and in a local shopping mall, about the oppressiveness of jock culture and the enormous pressures of feeling out of place in a rigidly conformist, predominantly white middle class community. It sounded like a plausible explanation at the time. Much of what we reported, though, was simply wrong, as attested by tens of thousands of official documents and other evidence that has at last seen the light of day after years of suppression by the local authorities. As the Colorado-based journalist Dave Cullen tells in his gripping and authoritative new book Columbine, Harris and Klebold had plenty of friends, did pretty well in school, were not members of the Trenchcoat Mafia, did not listen to Manson, were not bullied, harboured no specific grudges against any one group, and did not "snap" because of some last-straw traumatic event. All those stories were the product of hysteria, ignorance and flailing guesswork in the first few hours and days. The truth was more sinister. Not to get at anyone in particular, but because they hated the world and intended to have fun annihilating as much of it as they could. Harris, in particular, would have been insulted at the thought of being remembered as a mere shooter. The two boys were in fact very different. Harris quietly despised the people he took so much trouble to charm and could not wait to see them all die horrible deaths. Strangle them, squish their head, rip off their jaw, break their arms in half, show them who is God. Their planning, meanwhile, was nothing if not meticulous. First, they wanted to detonate two propane bombs in the cafeteria, killing not only the or so students taking early lunch but also students in the library above, which they hoped would come crashing down. Then, as the rest of the school swarmed for the exits, they would open fire with semiautomatic weapons from two positions in the car park. Assuming they survived that phase - they did not expect to - they would then ram their cars, loaded with more propane explosive, into arriving rescue workers, television news teams and police for one ghastly final conflagration. They were hoping for a death toll of at least 2,, matching the student population of the school. As it was, their homemade bombs did not detonate, and they were forced to improvise. They were indeed wearing long black coats, not because of any campus affiliation but simply to hide their arsenal of shotguns, semiautomatic machine pistols, pipe bombs, knives and small carbon dioxide canister bombs Harris called "crickets". They shot two students on the way in, then spent 49 terrifying minutes patrolling the hallways, the cafeteria, and the stairs before carrying out their worst carnage in the library. Bernall, it turns out, was shot and killed outright. She was a recent convert to evangelical Christianity, after a deeply troubled early adolescence, and perhaps for that reason her story became confused with that of another student. It was Valeen Schnurr, who was asked, by Klebold, if she believed in God, and answered yes. She was then spared. If the killers hated Christians, they were distinctly uneven in how they applied that hatred. At one point they joked about killing anyone in a white hat; one boy cowering beneath a desk quickly pulled a white cap off his head, and lived. The question of Nazi sympathies is a little more complicated. The boys had decided on 19 April - the anniversary of the botched government siege at Waco, Texas, in which 76 people perished by fire in , and also the anniversary of the Oklahoma City bombing. As it was, the plan was pushed back 24 hours because the local drug dealer who had promised to provide the boys with their ammunition did not come through on time. It was the first of many disappointments for a pair of killers aiming for even greater infamy than they ultimately achieved. Everything about the Columbine disaster is tinged with failure. The school, meanwhile, failed to recognise the danger, even though Harris spilled much of his venom on his publicly accessible website, and even though Klebold wrote an essay two months before the attack about a man gunning down innocents and enjoying it. On the day of the attacks, the Swat teams were so hesitant to swoop in mid-killing that they ended up compounding the disaster, allowing a PE teacher to bleed to death when early intervention would almost certainly have saved his life. The bulk of the withheld investigation documents were finally released in , the result of years of lawsuits, but not all: In some ways, Columbine is unlike other school shootings because of its sheer scale. In other ways, though, it is both a reference point and even an inspiration to successive killers - in Germany, Finland and Britain as well as the US. Seung Hui Cho, the disturbed gunman who killed more than 30 students at Virginia Tech in , called Harris and Klebold "martyrs". We can perhaps be grateful that the Columbine killers saw themselves in media-age terms as performers, who chronicled their thoughts and actions in great detail. As a result, we now know a whole lot more about how to recognise potential school shooters, and how to limit the damage once the shooting starts. The Swat teams at Virginia Tech did not hesitate for an instant, almost certainly saving the lives of a dozen or more people. At scores of high schools around the US, meanwhile, teachers and mental health professionals have taken death threats or the discovery of weapons with the utmost seriousness. The piece of the puzzle that remains most troubling is the role of the media. Harris and Klebold were playing to the cameras and there is evidence that many of their successors were motivated at least in part by the promise of instant mass-media notoriety. The influence of the media on real-life acts of violence is hotly debated and far from proven, but here is one statistic. Just about every recorded instance of mass murder given saturation coverage on US television is followed by another mass murder, somewhere around the country, within two weeks. They feel willing to die. The chatroom warning

If those kids were here right now, what would you say to them? I would listen to what they have to say. By the end of their violent rampage, fifteen people were dead—twelve students, one teacher, and the killers themselves—and another 24 were injured. After the shooting, everybody in America ran around like a decapitated chicken while they tried to explain it. This page is our attempt. This is easier for Harris and Klebold than with most spree killers—the two left behind a treasure trove of home videos, diaries, and other records that detailed their thought processes, attitudes, and plans for the massacre. This mountain of information is also largely responsible for the mystique that built up around the two and their crimes, especially in comparison to massacres with higher body counts. The two boys were juvenile delinquents who had a history of trouble with the law. The year before the shooting, they had both been arrested for breaking into and stealing tools from a locked van. They made such a good impression on the police that, in exchange for having their criminal records expunged, they would go through a program that included community service, psychiatric treatment, and—for Harris—anger management classes. For showing good behavior and making a good impression on their handlers, they were discharged from the program a few months early. In the memoirs they taped before the shooting, they bragged about how well they had fooled the police into thinking they had reformed. The two later made a video for a school project called Hitmen for Hire, in which they played two Bully Hunters, and Harris wrote a violent Doom Fan Fic for a creative writing project. Harris was also caught the year before making threats on his website to various students and teachers, and Klebold had a long history of cursing at teachers and getting into fights with his boss at the pizza place he worked at. Harris and Klebold were victims of bullying, including homophobic remarks, but they gave as good as they got: They often wrote in their diaries about how they themselves had bullied underclassmen and "fags". Ironically, Klebold identified as bisexual online, although he remained closeted in real life until he died. In early reports, the two were said to be members of the "Trenchcoat Mafia," a clique of gamers and self-styled outcasts who all wore black trenchcoats. The killers were also not quite the loners that early reports described them as—they had a number of friends who were unpopular, but friends nonetheless, and three days before the massacre, Klebold had taken female friend Robyn Anderson to the prom. The duo were avid gamers, particularly of Doom which Harris had even made mods for, and used the names "Reb" and "VoDKa" Harris and Klebold, respectively as both their online handles and their nicknames. In regards to motive, the general consensus amongst investigators says the pair—particularly Harris—were diehard nihilists who wanted to leave a mark on the world. Both diaries make frequent reference to the Oklahoma City bombing, the Waco Siege, and other disasters and massacres, noting how they wished to "outdo" these events. Their codename for the massacre was "NBK"—a reference to one of their favorite films, Natural Born Killers, in which the main characters go on a killing spree and become celebrities in the process. The location and timing of their massacre was no coincidence, and it emphasizes their lack of specific targets. No experience could be more universal than a normal day at school. The Massacre Harris and Klebold started planning their attack a year in advance. Their plan was to build a number of large bombs, which they would plant in the cafeteria, then detonate them at lunch time to destroy the cafeteria and the library above it. Had this come to pass, they would have killed hundreds of students in what would have been the deadliest act of domestic terrorism in American history—which is why they thought they would "top" Oklahoma City. After the explosion, they would pick off survivors outside as they fled the burning school. Notes in their journals also contain thoughts about heading to Denver International Airport, hijacking a plane, and crashing it into a building in New York City, as well as fleeing to Mexico. But most evidence suggests they had originally planned to attack the school on April 19, the anniversary of both the Oklahoma City bombing they hoped to top and the end of the Waco Siege. They were forced to push it back a day because a cache of ammo they needed was delivered that night. The killers arrived at the school at 11:00 AM. They headed back to their cars to wait for the bombs to go off. The bombs failed thanks to their lack of finesse in the finer points of bomb-making. The only bomb to detonate was a decoy that they had placed in a nearby field earlier that morning. Set to explode at 11:30 AM, they took off their trenchcoats, killed two students and a teacher, and wounded nine others as they went through the halls. When they walked in, Harris told everybody wearing a white baseball cap "a tradition amongst school athletes" to stand up. Harris and Klebold then killed ten people and wounded twelve others. The killers left the library at 12:00 PM. They went back into the now-emptied-out library at 12:30 PM. Early speculation said a third man had been involved in the shootings, based on reports that a strange man had been seen on the roof on the school he was a repairman who had locked himself up on the roof after he heard gunshots. Others claimed that the two killers could not have hauled all of the bombs into the cafeteria by themselves. All known evidence points to Harris and Klebold as the only culprits behind the massacre, but this has not stopped countless conspiracy theorists from speculating otherwise. The massacre was covered on national news as it was happening, in a way that previous ones never were. The irony of all this media attention is that it gave Harris and Klebold exactly what they wanted: The immediate aftermath of the massacre saw an untold number of apocryphal events finding their way into the Popular History version of the shooting. Moral Guardians of all stripes used Columbine as an excuse to rant about whatever they felt was evil or whatever would get them the best book deals, everybody else was searching for answers, and American high schools came under the thrall of a number of Columbine-related concepts, some of which had never happened. The word "columbine", once the name of the state flower of Colorado, entered the vernacular as a euphemism for a school shooting; many future school shooting plots made reference to "pulling a columbine" and a desire to "top" Harris and Klebold. Police forces, having witnessed firsthand how ineffective their traditional tactics were against spree killers who had no interest in taking hostages, began developing new responses to such threats. The image of the Badass Longcoat spree killer took off, not helped by the fact that The Matrix had been released just three weeks prior to the shooting. In reality, the killers had taken their trenchcoats off as soon as the shooting began; they wore ball caps, T-shirts, and jeans, leading many to believe that the coats were more about projecting a scary, iconic image to the victims and the media than anything. The change of clothes also succeeded in confusing early reports on how many shooters took part in the killing. A pair of heavily-publicized school shootings in the two years prior—one in Paducah, Kentucky and one in Springfield, Oregon—had killers who did fit the profile of the "lonely outcast", so the media automatically assumed that the Columbine killers were loners as well. And despite early reports of the spree being a vengeance killing with a particular targeting of jocks, Christians, and minorities, all facts point to a random killing spree with no specific category of victim. Of the aforementioned shootings, the only one in which the killer targeted a specific category of victim was the Kentucky shooting, in which the killer fired upon a Christian prayer group. In particular, the goth subculture suffered a huge backlash because of the shooting; their outcast status and "dark" personas made everyone else suspicious. No evidence suggests either Klebold or Harris embraced the goth subculture, preferring a more militaristic vibe in their personal style. And goths generally tend to be passive and pacifistic, with the old stereotype being that they are violent towards themselves rather than others. In any case, numerous schools modified their dress codes to ban trenchcoats and band merchandise as well as restrict the amount of black clothing a student could wear. One of the worst consequences of the shooting was how many schools began assuming that all school shooters fell under a certain list of stereotypes and could therefore be identified before they killed similar to a terrorist watchlist. In a Congress-mandated study, the FBI found that this idea was both untrue and a dangerous line of thought: If schools focused on trying to find students who fit a predetermined list of traits, real potential shooters could go unnoticed. Even so, if a school shooter is portrayed in the media, he "and it is usually a "he" will always be a shy, bullied student who keeps to himself, and this happens almost entirely because of this misconception. Violent video games became one of the most popular scapegoats for the massacre after the media learned that

Harris and Klebold were fans of Doom and Wolfenstein 3D. Armchair psychologists claimed that the killers had become desensitized to, and obsessed with, realistic violence as a result of playing such games. Infamous attorney Jack Thompson entered the public consciousness as an anti-video game activist because of the massacre, which began a career trajectory that would ultimately lead to his disbarment. Once people learned that Harris had made various levels for the game, the media almost immediately began claiming that those levels had been based on Columbine High School, with the demons replaced with students and teachers. Neither of those claims held true. The most elaborate of the so-called "Harris levels", titled "UAC Labs", can be downloaded at doomworld. Certain popular movies either liked by or seemingly connected to the killers also became targets for the ire of media watchdogs and concerned parents alike. The Matrix topped this list thanks to its heavily-stylized action scenes, a story about our reality being a lie, a proliferation of badass Longcoat heroes, and the fact that it had been released three weeks prior to the killings and was still a box office hit. Natural Born Killers, which both of the killers were huge fans of, came under fire for a plot that eerily mirrored the aftermath of the shooting. Less associated with the massacre, but a strong influence—particularly for Klebold—was the David Lynch film Lost Highway. The massacre also re-ignited the debate on gun control, with each side repeating its talking points. Gun control advocates said the tragedy could have been averted had there been more restrictions on the purchase of firearms, noting that Harris and Klebold had acquired their weapons through mostly legal means, specifically counting on the lack of background checks at gun shows. On the other side, gun rights advocates claimed that gun control—particularly the "gun-free" zones around schools—had left the students and teachers defenseless, which made the situation worse than it had to be. While Colorado would soon close the "gun show loophole" in-state, no significant federal gun control legislation was passed as a result of the shooting; five years later, the federal Assault Weapons Ban would expire without being renewed. As for schools themselves, they began taking security into their own hands. Schools across the nation installed metal detectors at entrances, hired security guards, mandated see-through backpacks, ran "intruder drills" similar to fire drills in order to practice what to do in case of a "active shooter event", and crafted "zero tolerance" policies regarding violence, the threat of violence, or even the perception of a threat. Those policies soon became controversial as many people, particularly students and social scientists, felt they had grown out of control and infringed upon the rights of students. A report by the Secret Service said that schools were taking false hope in such security measures—that not only would they do nothing to deter another massacre, but might push an unstable student suspended or expelled for a minor infraction over the edge and cause another massacre. Minority students were almost always disproportionately targeted by "zero tolerance" policies, too. But to this day, many schools still have "zero tolerance" policies in place, since the criticism received for punishing the relatively innocent is far easier to deal with than the perceived culpability for letting a violent situation escalate. Various conservative Christian groups claimed the massacre was a result of the secularization of society, the teaching of evolution and sex education, and a lack of religion in public schools. People within these groups—not all, but many—were more inclined to accept initial accounts that said two of the victims, Cassie Bernall and Rachel Scott, had been killed because of their Christian faith. The stories go that the victims were asked if they believed in God; when the two girls said "yes", Harris and Klebold killed them. Most authoritative investigations of the massacre concluded that such stories of how Bernall and Scott died were both apocryphal and based on the experience of Valeen Schnurr, a survivor who confirmed that the killers asked her if she believed in God. Despite this debunking, many religious groups still consider Bernall and Scott to be martyrs and symbols of faith in the face of death; a number of Columbine-inspired works created since their deaths have portrayed their killers as specifically targeting Christians. At least two future spree killers, Umpqua Community College shooter Christopher Harper-Mercer and Red Lake High School shooter Jeff Weise, asked at least one of their victims if they believed in God—likely as a sick homage to this urban legend. One of the most popular targets of social backlash was shock rock, metal, and other "Satanic", "unhealthy", or "violent" music; shock rock musician and provocateur Marilyn Manson became the lightning rod for those genres. In reality, Harris viewed Manson as a sellout and a poser, while Klebold was only a casual fan at best. This ultimately became a case of No Such Thing as Bad Publicity for Manson, as the massacre greatly increased his pop culture profile; his interview with Michael Moore about the shootingâ€”which contains the quote found at the top of this pageâ€”may have been his Moment of Awesome. Thanks to the date of the massacre, rumors emerged that the killers were either neo-Nazis or had a fascination with Adolf Hitler and his regime. Robyn Anderson and Devon Adams, who were close friends with Klebold, denied that either of the boys were neo-Nazis. Harris in particular had a distinct tendency for Putting on the Reich with Nazi salutes and quotations, if apparently mainly for shock value. Later investigations discovered that Harris had been rejected for military service due to his use of these medications. People then speculated that this rejection either drove him over the edge or led to him going off his medication in an attempt to be accepted.

Marilyn Manson and School Violence The music of shock-rocker Marilyn Manson (real name Brian Warner) is definitely controversial. This musician was banned from performing in South Carolina and has been offered $10, not to play in Salt Lake City.

From Ritalin to Marilyn: Forget gun laws, what else is being blamed for mass shootings? From Ritalin to Marilyn Manson, here are some of the most memorable factors blamed for school attacks. Eight students and two teachers were shot dead at Santa Fe High School in Galveston, Texas on Friday; year-old student Dimitrios Pagourtzis has been arrested over the mass shooting. Reports of multiple deaths in Texas school shooting, officer injured https: Nearly all of these perpetrators are male. Meanwhile, addressing the Santa Fe tragedy, Texas Lieutenant-governor Dan Patrick proposed that there are simply too many entrances and exits in schools, making it nigh on impossible to guard against gun-wielding attackers. His comments were lambasted on social media as users pointed out that being able to exit a building quickly is acutely important for fire safety. During his shooting spree, Lanza killed 20 children between six and seven years old as well as six adult staff members. He later committed suicide by turning the gun on himself. While the game had been on the internet since , there was no evidence that the Sandy Hook shooter ever played it. In the aftermath of the massacre, students reported that both Harris and Klebold were fans of Manson and modeled their gothic look of white makeup, dark hair and trench coats on the singer. Manson later said his links to the massacre "which were eventually proven false as neither shooter was actually a fan of the singer" almost ended his career. In an interview with filmmaker Michael Moore, Manson said he believed he had become a political scapegoat. After the fatal shooting of 14 students and three staff at Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School in Parkland, Florida, talk turned to the possibility of arming teachers. Trump realDonaldTrump February 22, The suggestion provoked massive amounts of debate. The idea has now been entered into proposed legislation in Florida. The proposal means there would be an extra 37, more guns statewide, according to the Tampa Bay Times. In July , a study from Arizona State researcher Sherry Towers found that mass killings are more likely to happen in clusters and within short periods of time. The study suggests that shootings spread like a contagion, when one person sees a media report they then concoct their own plan " although whether that person should have easy access to guns is a separate issue entirely. Once the website was made public after the massacre, AOL permanently deleted it from its servers. The blog also detailed Harris sneaking out of the house to cause mischief and vandalism, and described the trouble he, his friend Dylan Klebold and others were causing, such as lighting fireworks. Harris ended a blog post detailing his wishes to kill with "All I want to do is kill and injure as many of you as I can, especially a few people. Like Brooks Brown;" a classmate of his. Investigator Michael Guerra was told about the website. When he accessed it, Guerra discovered numerous violent threats directed against the students and teachers of Columbine High School. Other material included blurbs that Harris had written about his general hatred of society, and his desire to kill those who annoyed him. The affidavit also mentioned the discovery of an exploded pipe bomb in February , and a suspicion of Harris being involved in the unsolved case. The affidavit was never filed. The judge sentenced the duo to attend a juvenile diversion program. Diversion As a result, both boys attended mandated classes such as anger management and talked with diversion officers. Harris also began attending therapy classes with a psychologist. As part of mandatory therapy, Harris was prescribed antidepressants by a psychiatrist. Klebold had a history of drinking and failed a dilute urine test, but neither he nor Harris attended any substance abuse classes. Not to mention our revenge in the commons. Journals Harris and Klebold both kept journals, which were released to the public in . In the journals, the pair would document their arsenal and plan of attack, as well as their feelings of anger and superiority over those around them. He began to write in a journal instead, recording his thoughts and plans. Klebold had already been writing his thoughts since March . In November , he mentioned going on a killing spree. Harris even wrote on his website about trying to escape to Mexico after the attack, or hijacking an aircraft at Denver International Airport and crashing it into a building in New York City. They both displayed themes of violence in their creative writing projects. Harris wished for "a lot of foreshadowing and dramatic irony " to be involved in the massacre plot. Both had actively researched war and murder. Tapes In one video called Radioactive Clothing, they are depicted with fake guns and rigging fake explosives to "take out another one of those radioactive clothes infested camps". It depicts Harris and Klebold as part of the Trench Coat Mafia , a clique in the school who wore black trench coats, [37] extorting money for protecting preps from bullies. On April 20, approximately thirty minutes before the attack, they made a final video saying goodbye and apologizing to their friends and families. As a result, select victim families and journalists were allowed to see them, and they were then kept from the public indefinitely for fear of inspiring future massacres. The tapes have since been destroyed. The pair claimed they were going to make copies of the tapes to send to news stations, but apparently never got around to it. Nixon tape Harris once did a school project involving a micro cassette tape audio recording of a fellow named Nixon about his life in Singapore. This too has never been made public. It is known as the Nixon tape. On it Harris said "It is less than nine hours now. Because of this, Anderson could not be charged with any crime. Manes and Duran were sentenced to a total of six years and four-and-a-half years in prison, respectively. Using instructions obtained via the Internet and the Anarchist Cookbook , they constructed a total of 99 bombs. During the massacre, they carried lighters as well as match strikers taped to their forearms to light the pipe bombs and crickets. Harris also attempted to make napalm , and envisioned a kind of backpack and flamethrower. They both attempted to get another friend and coworker Chris Morris, who was a part of the Trench Coat Mafia, to keep the napalm at his house, but he refused. Harris also tried to recruit him to be a third shooter, but would play it off as a joke when rebuked. They purchased six propane tanks on the morning of the attack. Each cafeteria bomb was made from one 20 pounds 9. Cans and bottles filled with gasoline were also set throughout the cars; they did not bother to rig everything together. The massacre

According to their journals and videos, the pair hoped that after detonating their home-made explosives in the cafeteria at the busiest lunch hour, killing hundreds of students, they would shoot and toss bombs at survivors fleeing from the school. Several official sources claim they planned to shoot the fleeing survivors from the parking lot, but moved to the staircase on a hill at the west side of the school when the bombs failed. Only the pipe bombs and one of the aerosol canisters detonated, causing a small fire, which was quickly extinguished by the fire department. Bomb technicians immediately examined the bombs, and relayed to those at the school the possibility of devices with motion activators. Harris parked his vehicle in the junior student parking lot, by the south entrance, and Klebold parked in the adjoining senior student parking lot, by the west entrance. The school cafeteria, their primary bomb target, with its long outside window-wall and ground-level doors, was between their parking spots. According to Brown, who was in the parking lot smoking a cigarette, he was surprised to see Harris, whom he had earlier noted had been absent from an important class test. Get out of here. Meanwhile, Harris and Klebold armed themselves, hiding weapons beneath black trench coats with straps and webbing, and carrying backpacks and duffel bags filled with pipe bombs and ammunition. Harris also had his shotgun in one of the bags. Also beneath the trench coats, Harris wore a white t-shirt which read "Natural Selection" in black letters, as well as a homemade bandolier; Klebold wore a black t-shirt which read "Wrath" in red letters. Harris put on a black fingerless glove on his right hand, and Klebold was already wearing the matching fingerless glove on his left. Shooting begins Injuries and deaths in initial incident 1. Rachel Scott, age Killed by shots to the head, torso, and leg alongside the west entrance of the school. Richard Castaldo, age Shot in the arm, chest, back, and abdomen alongside the west entrance to the school. Daniel Rohrbough, age Fatally injured by shots to the abdomen and leg on the west staircase, shot through the upper chest at the base of the same staircase. Sean Graves, age Shot in the back, foot, and abdomen on the west staircase. Lance Kirklin, age Critically injured by shots to the leg, neck, and jaw on the west staircase. Michael Johnson, age Shot in the face, arm, and leg to the west of the staircase. Mark Taylor, age Shot in the chest, arms, and leg to the west of the staircase. Anne-Marie Hochhalter, age Brian Anderson, age Injured near the west entrance by flying glass. Patti Nielson, age Hit in the shoulder by shrapnel near the west entrance. Stephanie Munson, age Shot in the ankle inside the North Hallway. William David Sanders, age Died of blood loss after being shot in the neck and back inside the South Hallway. The cafeteria bombs failed to explode. Klebold threw a pipe bomb towards the parking lot, which only partially detonated. Thinking the pipe bomb was no more than a crude senior prank, Castaldo did not take it seriously. Several students inside the school during the attack also believed they were watching a senior prank at first. It is unknown who fired first; Harris shot and killed Scott, and Castaldo reported that Scott was hit immediately before he was. After the first two shootings, Harris removed his trench coat and aimed his carbine down the west staircase toward three youths: The three friends had been ascending the staircase directly below the shooters. All three youths were shot and wounded. The other three escaped uninjured. He came up to Lance Kirklin, who was already wounded and lying on the ground, weakly calling for help. He rubbed blood on his face and played dead. Klebold only slightly entered the cafeteria, and did not shoot at the several people still inside. Officials speculated that Klebold went to check on the propane bombs. They walked toward the west entrance, throwing pipe bombs in several directions including onto the roof, very few of which detonated. Witnesses heard one of them say "This is what we always wanted to do. She had intended to walk outside to tell the two students to "Knock it off," [74] thinking they were either filming a video or pulling a student prank. Nielson ran back down the hall into the library, alerting the students inside to the danger and telling them to get under desks and keep silent. Police response At The only paved route took him around the school to the east and south on Pierce Street, where at

The synopsis below may give away important plot points. Later investigation showed the bowling session was based on mistaken recollections, and Glenn Moore of the Golden Police Department concluded that they were absent from school on the day of the attack. Nevertheless, Michael Moore incorporates the bowling theme into his documentary. For example, Moore films men of the Michigan militia using bowling pins for their target practice. When interviewing former classmates of the two boys, Moore notes that the students took a bowling class in place of physical education. When he notes that this might have very little educational value; the girls he interviews generally agree. They note how Harris and Klebold led a very introverted lifestyle and had a very careless attitude toward the game, and that nobody thought twice about it. Moore asks if the school system is responding to the real needs of their students or if they are reinforcing fear. Moore also interviews two young residents of Oscoda, Michigan in a local bowling alley, and learns that guns are relatively easy to come by in the small town. Eric Harris spent some of his early years in Oscoda while his father was serving in the U. Moore compares gun ownership and gun violence in other countries with that in the United States and concludes that there is no connection between gun ownership and gun violence. Moore suggests sarcastically that bowling could have been just as responsible for the attacks on the school as could have Marilyn Manson; or even Bill Clinton, who launched bombing attacks on several countries around that time. The film follows Moore as he goes to the bank, makes his deposit, fills out the forms, and awaits the result of a background check before walking out of the bank carrying a brand new Weatherby hunting rifle. Jones; a man who takes his shirt off and is shot during a riot. It is implied that the presence of this facility within the community, and the acceptance of institutionalized violence as a solution to conflict, contributed to the mindset that led to the massacre. He illustrates his thesis by visiting neighborhoods in Canada near the Canada-U. In this section, a montage of possible causes for gun violence are stated by several social pundits. He examines Marilyn Manson as a cause, but states that Germany listens to more Marilyn Manson and has a greater Goth population than does the United States, with less gun violence Germany: He examines violent movies, but notes that they have the same violent movies in other countries, showing The Matrix with French subtitles France: He also examines video games, but states that violent video games come from Japan Japan: United States - 11, 3. After a number of attempts to evade the issue, a K-Mart spokesperson says that the firm will change its policy and phase out the sale of handgun ammunition; this comes after Moore and the victims go to the nearest K-Mart store, purchase all of their ammunition, and return the next day with several members of the media.
