

1: Successful Writer's Handbook, The

The handbook opens with a practical, down-to-earth discussion of study skills, time management, reading strategies, and critical thinking - the essentials for good academic work and excellent papers.

The purpose of the professional association of these diverse groups is to uphold the highest standards possible. From a handful of events in the early s to more than today in the U. Programs are organized to educate aspiring writers in many specialties, including writing for children, religious writing, science fiction writing, and other genres. Unlike academic programs, conferences confer no degrees, although they may issue certificates or offer college credit. Admission to many events may or may not be dependent upon proof of ability or evidence of prior study. Organizers of conferences often say the goals of their conferences include: All conferences can benefit from their ongoing research, annual self-evaluation, and periodic independent assessment in its effort to offer the best education for writers and to make the best possible contribution to the advancement of an educated audience for contemporary writing. A High Standard for Conference Faculty Conference faculty may include writers in all genres, as well as editors, agents, publishers and other contributors to the literary arts community. Whether the conference retains a recurring faculty, or new faculty is solicited each year, faculty is accomplished, active and knowledgeable in their area of specialty. Instructors of workshops and classes are experienced teachers and have distinguished themselves as artists who have published significant work in their genre. Conference faculty is accessible and participates in interactive events, in addition to lectures, workshops, or panel discussions. Faculty represents various genres of writing as well as a variety of approaches to their craft, based on aesthetic differences related to their ethnic, cultural, and other backgrounds. Faculty have clear understanding of their role s during conference, appropriate support lodging, transportation, etc. A Well-Focused Program Conference organizers have a mission statement guiding the purposes and goals of their conference. Conference programs center around the craft of writing and may offer venues for related topics such as publishing, the writing life, teaching writing, and others. Workshops maintain a good faculty-to-student ratio, not to exceed ; other classes should not exceed a ratio. Complete conference schedule is available to participants well in advance of the conference. Administrative Support Whether attached to the program of a college or university, an independent arts organization, or a professional society, a conference benefits from strong leadership, adequate staffing, and professional management. The ideal conference director should meet the following requirements: The Conference Director should be an experienced administrator as well as have personal experience as a writer. The Conference Director maintains full involvement in the organization of the conference and takes an active role while it progresses. Volunteers may be used to round-out staff workloads when appropriate and when provided with adequate instruction and oversight. Selection Criteria There are conferences for all levels of writers. Conferences for beginning writers need not demand proof of ability or evidence of past study, but those conferences that support intermediate or advanced writers should meet the following criteria for choosing participants. Applications should be readily available with reasonable deadlines. Applicants should be selected based on a codified and reasonable set of selection criteria. Applicants should have some experience in a classroom or workshop environment. Other criteria may be used when evaluating qualified applicants, including but not limited to: Other Complementary Assets and Infrastructure Contracts and procedures: Faculty contracts should be legally binding on both parties, clarifying conditions for voiding the contract. A clearly stated list of costs and dates, registration deadlines, cancellations and refunds, if any, should be made available for participants. A procedure for dealing with complaints, liability issues, or other problems arising from disputes between conference faculty, participants or guests should be established. There should be a process for collecting annual evaluations from participants, faculty, and conference staff and reviewing this information preparatory to a biannual self-evaluation and review of programs and policies. Advertising is truthful, it lists only confirmed and contracted writers as faculty, and, if need be, it distinguishes between workshop teachers and the visiting readers or lecturers. A fair practice in advertising, awarding of scholarships, faculty contracts, and policy regarding guests. A clearly-written brochure listing all faculty with adequate descriptions of their roles at the conference. Amenities and other offerings: Reasonable options for safe, clean, and affordable housing and meals if participants are solicited from outside the immediate area. A venue for the sale of books by faculty members, and, if appropriate, participants. Clear information to attendees and faculty as to what is and is not provided for furnishings:
