If you watch your broad and slender consonants, the unstressed vowel must come right. And the quality of the consonants is always marked by the vowels which surround it. Now let us take two verbs, one with a broad stem and one with a slender: This form, originally 3 sg. The past, imperfect and conditional take the particle do asp. Before vowels and fh- which is silent, the o of do is dropped: The following list should be learned: Exercise 6 Put the following into the present: We read the books. The boy drinks the milk. They do not understand. I spend the money. They shut the door, but they do not shut the window. He writes a letter. He conceals the truth. They understood the words. Did the priest believe the boys? You lost the money. Did he strike the dog? We filled the bottles. Did the boys drink the water? No, but they drank milk. The priests read the books. You have seen how the genitive singular is formed in the two classes of nouns in Lesson I, and in Irish the genitive is used not only for possession but also as an adjective, and in other ways. The genitive plural in these two classes is the same as the nom. But in addition to the genitive, there is a dative case for what is called in English the indirect object. In Irish you must use a preposition, and there is a separate form for the second declension in the singular, and for all nouns in the plural. Finally there is a vocative case, used of a person spoken to, and the vocative of the first declension has the same form as the genitive in the singular, and a separate form in the plural. But it is preceded as in Arabic by a vocative particle a asp. Now we can tackle these two declensions in full, and the two paradigms should be learned by heart: With the article all prepositions cause eclipsis, except den, don which aspirate; i and le with the article make LESSON III 37 insan, insna and leis an, leisna respectively,¹ but insan is commonly reduced to sa asp. Note that the definite article may not be doubled: Bhriseadar an fhuinneog le clochaibh. We put past the money under the stone. He put a glass on the table. The men break stones on the road. The man is at the head of the table. The horses run round the field. He took the books from the boys. We left the window of the room open. God and Mary to you! God and Mary to you and Patrick! God and Mary to you, Tom! I am well, thank God! Are the children at home? They are all inside in the kitchen. Is Michael outside in the yard? He is, but John and Nora are in Cork. The boys are over there in the field. Where is the scythe? It is here under the hedge. This idiom, with the past participle of a verb, provides a perfect tense, distinct from the simple past: The past participle is formed with the ending -te, -ta, according as the verbal stem is slender or broad. The t is aspirated after b, bh, c, g, m, p, r: Tom has read the letter. Eileen has a new dress. The young man has lost the books. There is a cart at the door. The child has drunk the milk. The man has money. Tim has lost the overcoat. The boys have broken the bottles. The old school is closed, and a new school has been built on top of the hill. Margaret has written the letter. The verbal noun of regular verbs is usually formed by adding -adh pron. The future has only one set of forms: An rabhais ag caint leis? They were cleaning the windows. We were working on the roads. Will you be coming again tomorrow? Are you going home now? The priest is saying Mass now. Margaret and Eileen are watching the men reaping the oats. Will they be clipping the horses? No; it is cold still. Were they breaking the stones? No; they were bringing drawing in the hay. She is sweeping the floor. We are tired, but we are not satisfied yet. Personal Pronouns Possessives and Pronominals We have seen p. These forms contain an old particle ro which was used with the past tense of verbs in the earlier language, and has been ousted by do. Note that these particles containing ro aspirate the initial of the verb. The children did not believe the story. Did they understand the story? Did she not wash the dishes? I did not write the letter. Did you drink the milk? You did not milk the cow. Did they not sell the horses? Did we shut the windows? They did not spend the money. Did he stay in the town? Did they not look at the paper? Did the child fall into the water? We did not cut the hay yet. Personal Pronouns The personal pronouns are: Singular 1 mise 2 tusa 3 seisean, sise Plural sinne sibh-se siad-san For the 2 sg. Note that a pronoun as object tends to stand at the end of the sentence: Singular 1 mo asp.

Although everyone in Ireland speaks English, there are regions known as the Gaeltacht that use Irish as the main language of communication, both in businesses and in families. It uses the same alphabet as other European languages although it is the only language that still traditionally uses its own special font. The phonetics pronunciation based on spelling are quite different, and this usually scares a lot of people. But you can learn the differences very quickly and after that they are consistent unlike in English, so you can read any given text aloud pretty well after a small amount of study. The language also interestingly has no word for yes or no like in Thai for example. We simply repeat the verb of the question, e. Did you eat your lunch? There are a few tricky aspects of the language that merit a mention though. You know the way in most languages you change the end of words in certain situations? Well in Irish we very merrily change the beginning. This is something common in other Celtic languages and adds to a nice flow between words. However, thanks to the magic of initial mutations we can change the start of words in many situations! This would be the vocative case for the linguists out there. You see, we keep the letter of the original base word e. However, despite the huge differences, like in some other languages, words are formed logically using prefixes, suffixes and combinations of roots. And then sometimes we just separate the words in an easy way. Exit is simply bealach amach way out. Also, because of the initial mutations mentioned above, capital letters upper case can occur as the second or third letter in a word! The best part of all, is that Irish speakers are generally always happy to help! Whether in Ireland or abroad, there are usually some books in major libraries on learning Irish. You can also change the language of your computer and software to be entirely in Irish! Then of course there are lots of sites online to help you practice your Irish. Here is a small sample: The audio has some typical phrases that you can repeat. Gramadach na Gaeilge â€” An extremely in-depth look at Irish grammar. Perhaps more interesting to linguists due to how extremely detailed it gets! Irish Gaelic Translator forum â€” Get an almost instantaneous answer from a native or fluent speaker of the language on simple questions and short translations. This forum is very active and will be a great help! This is the best way to hear what the language actually sounds like! Watching TV shows originally in Irish! There are many more categories, but the site is navigated entirely in Irish of course. Irish dictionary â€” free online dictionary. Not good for basic words, but gives declensions and plurals for a lot of words; for intermediate and higher level learners. You can also check out a video I made about my experience in the Gaeltacht. The course I took was given by Oideas Gael in Donegal and takes place regularly every year for all levels. You can watch it in both English and Irish here] I hope this post gives those of you out there curious about the Irish language a little hint into how to learn and use it! Let me know in the comments about your own Irish learning experiences!
