They lower the conversion rate and hence, assuage the success of the website. Sliders hamper conversion rates due to many reasons: The moving effect of ad rotation causes a saccade, which makes the visitor uncomfortable and therefore, they neglect the advertisement. They distract the users and cause difficulty in performing the primary task, for which they had visited the website. Therefore, harming the actual intent of which the site concerned, had been made. Carousels or sliders are food to indolent brains. They let the designer stuff everything into a single space, thereby killing creativity and more importantly, productivity. Rotating banners reduce comprehensibility. Visitors remain half-informed about the content of the ads, which decrease their confidence in the same. Banners cover up unnecessary space on the web page, which could have been better utilized. Many other negative points about sliders exist since they are an old strategy. Here is the example of rotation banner on Youtube: Approaches That Replaced Rotating Banners in Many modern approaches exist, which can benefit the designer in achieving a better conversion rate for the website and filling up the space left, which was earlier occupied by the rotation sliders: Using the space to create visual effects and better, clearer web design. Provide readily available detail that helps the visitor gain trust. Provide legitimate and well-known client logos, contact information, past work, etc. Research and try to advertise via social media. The bottom line is that, instead of trying to feed the visitor everything, more focus should be on prioritizing the actual intention of the website. The landing page is one such recent strategy which makes use of the same. It is a standalone web page, that is disconnected from the site, and is convincing the visitor to perform a particular action. They work better than rotating ads, primarily because they are vivid in intent and information. Moreover, they target the audience according to their first focus and do not try to bundle up everything, clumsily, into a single space. It could also destroy everything his family has worked for. One unwillingly opened eye proved this to be true when the bleary blue numerals on the bedside clock read a merciless 4: She claimed that if Erwin was doing anything especially private, he would have the good sense to lock himself in. The merman had all of his human family together--Hanji and Moblit on shore and Erwin and Nanaba on the yacht, momentarily united. He would need to be close to as many of them he could reach. I need to see him. Do you know how bad it is? It sounds like one of the mers grabbed him by the ankle and dragged him into his tank. It did not compute. Nana is on her way down. When he looked at his phone in a few minutes he had no doubt it would be sitting there without a single message on it. The wall to wall display tank ensured that. He would worry about Moblit until he saw for himself that the man was okay. Companion-class mers fed on the devotion of their family group. He preferred to have Erwin leaning over him, feeling perhaps that he was most secure that way. The tank had been built for housing show mers, which were beautiful and docile--perfect for large displays. They were the only species that could legally be kept and bred, owing to their definitive lack of human intelligence. They sat somewhere on the scale just below harbor seals and they could not take human shape, nor did they give any indication that they could comprehend their captivity. Erwin kept a very sweet female pair in his aft tank, but the one that divided his study from his bedroom was fish only. They still had humanoid faces and it was still unnerving to wake up and find them staring at him, politely awaiting their first feeding of the day. They were about to run a CT scan to check his brain for bleeding when we hung up. It was one of the new ones. Probably, she had felt him stiffen. Apparently, this one had been feeding as a siren for years, so the reaper should have been dormant. He sat for a moment in stunned silence, floored by the knowledge of what Hanji had done. We certainly have no disagreements on that point. I just believe that Hanji had the best possible intentions, so when we get there Will you be okay, Brother? The exchange is safe. They probably want to hide him in one of the quarantine tanks and keep him as a pet. He pushed the sheets from his legs and disengaged himself from Mike to stand. If we turn the yacht around now we should be up the coast by sunrise. The red LEDs were eerie when they came on, like mood lighting from a horror film, but they were far less hard on his scaly roommates at night than the actinics. For the moment, his fish were safe. It was the Siren Exchange he worried about. He raised his free hand and waved briefly. Like most of his kind, Mike was as hard as granite and built entirely of muscle, but despite his size, he could change direction on a dime in the water. It took them a moment and Mike watched that painstaking care with a worried scowl. What would you like me to do about the Jeckyl Island fundraiser? Give the guest list to Eld and have him contact everyone with my apologies. Would you be okay with that, Mike, if we all stayed close? The man looked washed out and exhausted under the yellow dock lights, but he stood steadily on his own two feet without needing to lean on Hanji as the two of them made their way slowly to the slip. You should go, Erwin. You need to get yourself back into the news before you propose the Reaper Corps to the UK. What I am worried about is the situation we have right here at home. How had that interview gone? How had it been possible for a reaper hybrid to sit there across a desk from them and carry on an intelligible conversation? If the hybrid had truly snapped, it had snapped quickly. There was a gentle lurch as their hull nudged up against the bumpers lining the inside of the slip, then Hanji was kneeling to tie them off onto one of the cleats. Mike was gone as soon as they came to a full stop, turning away from the rail to descend quickly down the back stairs to the first open air deck where he could step off the yacht. This is my good side. And Mike did not disappoint. He folded Moblit gently into the lingering sort of embrace that the mer was best known for. It sounded like an old argument. I want a look at the hybrid. Our apartment is open. Hanji knew to be concerned about that. They were good about that. I had no intention of hiding him, but I did want to wait. He never fed in all the time he was here and I wanted to see him settling in before you and I fought over it. You put everyone in this facility at risk. Sirens come to us over others because we have an excellent reputation for safety among other things. What do you think would happen if one of them was killed here? He was articulate, Erwin. He was quiet, but reasonable--calm. We drank tea in my office and he stood there trying to pretend that he was looking at my bookshelf rather than tidying it up like he was actually doing. He is a reaper hybrid, not a siren, and the difference between those two classes is substantial. Turning him away would have been a death sentence. Moblit nearly died for this, Hanji. Their characteristic vigor was gone. We lowered it enough that he could use his lungs. I hardly blame you for your feelings about reapers and I share those, you know that. But Levi is not a reaper. He has all the same faculties that make us human. You can talk to him if you like. He only just brushed up against it and was able to pull away. The one on the other side was mostly used by clients coming from their lives on shore. The entrance Erwin and Hanji used was the one primarily for sirens, who came back and forth that way from the ocean. Some of their clients came that way by boat as well, docking in one of several extra slips the facility provided for that purpose. They were equipped to handle traffic coming from both directions, but this was the only door that remained open all night. The large, uneven flagstones turned a welcoming golden-orange under the short footlights that lined the path. They had a saltwater pool back there, mostly used for event gatherings and private bookings, but some of the sirens also used it as a place to congregate and indeed, there was a small cluster of them hanging around the deep end--probably early risers rather than night owls. They looked enchanting in the dark, their metallic scales catching the pool lights and glimmering like precious stones. The night guard waved and Erwin waved back. I wanted to wait and see what you decided. Hanji, what decision of mine are you waiting on? If this mer is becoming a reaper he needs to be dealt with. I want you to meet him before I explain anything else. They only passed a few others to get to his. Hanji waved to a couple of the sirens as they passed, but most of the tanks still had their privacy curtains closed as the mers inside of them slept. He sat in water to his waist, his gill plates closed, though the left one was swollen partially open, the wide, bloody gash beneath it just starting to gum over. There was something else--something sickly and exhausted about him that was unmistakable in its trajectory. The shadows around his eyes were deep, his lids struggling with gravity and mostly losing. There was something he lacked--some fundamental vitality. Then, Erwin saw what lay beneath the water. This was not one of the beautiful poolside sirens with their glimmering scales and silvery fins. The hybrid was darkly barred in faint, horizontal stripes, his tail built for the side-to-side movement of a shark rather than the mammalian up-and-down of other mers. Each of the fins along his back was sharply barbed and colored like gunmetal. Faint, blue light pulsed through him, passing along the vertebrae of his spine and down into the tail.

3: 'Tempest in a teapot' - the meaning and origin of this phrase

Tempest in a Teapot is a loose tea company dedicated to combining gourmet teas from around the globe with locally harvested fruits and herbs. Run by the Tea Ladies, sisters Tammy Smith and Becca Emerson, they use all natural ingredients found in their home state of Maine to create healthy drinks for tea lovers.

With the surrender of the House of Representatives to the Democratic party one could be forgiven the panic that Trumpian Power had reached its zenith. Or perhaps the fear that the legions of MAGA could no longer overcome the power of an emboldened and increasingly openly desperate progressive left. Unfortunately fear is contagious and this particular trepidation could not be farther from the truth and needs to be quickly put to bed. It is practically Holy Writ that a newly seated President lose control of the House of Representatives the first midterm of their administration. Period, point blank, Americans are wary, and rightfully so, of incorporating the full power of the people in just one party. In fact a reversal in the House has failed to manifest less than a handful of times since our inception. Following the road map of historical precedence, several truths become rapidly obvious. The Trump Administration surrendered less than half of the Seats considered normal when compared to other recent two term administrations and in fact lost the fewest Congressional seats since Ronald Reagan. Of the thirty seats lost in the House, again a paltry less than half of normal turnover, twenty one were Incumbent GOP Representatives from Districts won by Hillary Clinton in Furthermore of the Republican Representatives sent packing many were of the milquetoast, moderate, Rhino, Never Trump flavor and had failed to embrace the new furor alight in the Country. Truth be told, the House will not miss these deadwood swamp floaters. The rabid left grossly overextended themselves as they ramped up the rhetoric and hate during the Brett Kavanaugh Supreme Court nomination confirmation and it cost them. Armed with this knowledge and added to the information already given one can see start to glimpse the the truth. The left failed miserably despite their rabid efforts to turn the Trump tide. The Conservative bulwark in the Senate was not only defended but expanded upon. The Supreme Court, for the first time in decades, is firmly in the hands of Constitutionally minded Shepherds. Reinforcements, by the way, that are now in a friendly pipeline to be expedited by an even stronger Senate. Taking this and the fact that Trump has dropped the ban hammer on numerous socialist, progressive Justices to have them replaced by a strong Constitutional minded judiciary and one will see Americas Lady Justice finally righting her scales and sharpening the rust from her sword. Even in a Constitutional crisis, as promised by some progressive leadership, requiring a convention of states, Republicans control the State Houses and Governorships. Although the loss of several Governorships, especially in battleground states is troubling and this elections one conceivable black mark. This has left the progressives with two choices; 1 Win back the goodwill of their historic base by settling in and using what little power they have to negotiate with the President to Govern the Nation or, 2 Double down on the tantrums, that cost them the Senate, to feed the growing young communist influence now loose in the party, an influence that has already begun biting the hand that feeds it. Either way, the Democrats new Catbird seat is wired to the wall and Donald Trump has his hand on the switch. So in summation, fear not fair Citizens, all is well. Yes, we are in a war and there are many battles left to win or lose, but we are fair positioned and provisioned for the contest, far more so than when we were staring down the abysmal horror of a Clinton Presidency a mere two years ago. In truth, the promised Progressive blue wave was closer to a wet fart than an unopposable force of nature sweeping all before it. Sure we have to deal with the smell, but they are the ones sitting in it and they better clean themselves up post haste or risk not being invited back. Please support our coverage of your rights.

4: Tempest in a teapot - Crossword Clue Answers

Readers from England who get irate that 'a tempest in a teapot' is a mangling of their perfectly good phrase 'a storm in a teacup' and that this US interloper only exists because of the neat alliteration of tempest and teapot need to calm down; the tempest version is the earlier form and it isn't American in origin.

Basically, from those sources, I could glean only that a woman named Jane Brocket had written a book in praise of domesticity and that a certain brand of feminist had found it terribly threatening. In the end, the stakes on this particular book are not terribly high. Brocket makes money selling it or not, it will not single handedly turn the tide toward a world of women in aprons preparing perfect meals served on hand glazed plates and hand knit placemats. It is not the gentle art of domesticity that is truly on trial here, but two distinct visions of womanhood. And to be honest, whether Ms. Back in the day, the now completely inane shopping and shoes comic Cathy was actually an incisive critique of the Superwoman myth. It used to deal with issues like sexual harassment and single parenthood and the feelings of being left behind when everyone else seems to Have It All. But Superwoman did not die with the idea that a woman could and should be everything at once. Today we seem to have a dichotomy between the Superwoman who works outside the home and the Superwoman who stays at home. These twin deities, so often portrayed as enemies in the major media outlets, are no more the norm for most women than the Superwoman of the eighties. But if they are to be Superwomen, if the myth is to persist, they must be Very Different as well as being Super. The working woman, therefore, is career driven and successful, a perfectly coiffed Madonna in a power suit, while the stay at home mother of myth not only raises fabulous, interested, stimulated children – she does so while keeping a perfect home, and she does so in a post feminist world, a world where she can knowingly wink at the camera while polishing the silverware. Most of us, I believe, reside somewhere in the middle – women who might work and raise children, sometimes make the bed, sometimes leave the cereal bowls on the table till dinner time, sometimes make a perfect home cooked meal, sometimes decide that a block of cheese will tide everyone over. That they are soliloquys is evidenced by the fact that these are largely personality driven views of domesticity. This means that criticism of the domesticity on display cannot avoid the personal. We reject the brand of Martha Stewart, and in so doing, we look a little closer at Stewart herself. I personally feel stifled by both views. I love to knit and cook. I have a frilly apron with teapots on it. I feel unspeakably adorable when I wear that apron. I find it practical, as well, in that it has actually protected my clothes from spills and splashes in the kitchen. I do not like to clean. It is as much as I can do to force myself to pick up some of the most obvious messes many days. Today I have not cleared the breakfast table. The boys are at school, and their cereal bowls sit discarded on the table and I do not think I will clear them until I feel like it. The important part of all of this is that I do not feel like any of this is a reflection of me as a woman. But my husband is just as likely as me to be the one serving the meal, leaving out the bowls, picking them up, washing them, as I am. My husband is going to come home and he will not expect me to have cleaned the house. He will be happier with me if I can show him a drawing I did today than if I can show him the laundry I did. This is where I think the tempest starts and ends. We are still seeing the art domesticity as part and parcel of the art of being womanly. Perhaps if we looked upon it as one hobby in a sea of hobbies, one that is not truly about what is domestic, but the hobby of being domestic, we could watch the tempest settle down into a well mannered pot of tea, to be served, of course, to oneself, lounging about in a teapot bedecked apron while the breakfast dishes lie fallow on the table.

5: Tempest in a Teapot by Judy Baer

What a tempest in a teapot! This expression has appeared in slightly different forms for more than years. Among the variations are storm in a cream bowl, tempest in a glass of water, and storm in a hand-wash basin. The British prefer storm in a teacup. The current American forms were first recorded in

Unfortunately, much of it has been either premature or wrong. A Congressman from Northern New York, uninformed but still generous with his opinions, declared that Canada was thick with al Qaeda cells owing to its liberal a truly filthy word in the United States immigration and refugee laws. This strain in our society should alert us to the possibility, however remote, of skewed investigations where terror is concerned. The New York Times, that tea-sipping, wealthy widow of American newspapers, went out of her way to recognize The Toronto Star for substantial coverage of events. That is not praise clear-headed people welcome, The Times often having been on the wrong side of human rights issues as well as having served as the official Wal-Mart Greeter on the path to war. Condoleezza Rice, too, took approving note of events in Toronto, but that surely is the moral equivalent of a twinkle from the eyes of Joachim von Ribbentrop. Members of any security and intelligence apparatus are not immune to such blandishments. Results or seeming results bring praise, promotion, and budget increases to establishments that normally enjoy little public recognition. I have no reason to believe there has been inappropriate behavior by officials here, but I emphasize the importance of healthy skepticism until a clear picture emerges. The lack of healthy skepticism in America is precisely what has reduced that society to a spineless acceptance of whatever authority says, no matter how uninformed or unreasonable. The known facts of the Toronto case are simple. This prompted additional investigation, and a group of young men sharing angry dreams was discovered. Finally, when a 3-ton load of ammonium nitrate, a fertilizer that can be used as a component for an explosive, was offered by the watchers and accepted by someone in the group, a wave of arrests quickly followed. My first observation is that any group of young men thoughtless enough to reveal violent intentions on an Internet chat site represent a pretty low-level threat. After all, these chat sites are monitored constantly by police and intelligence services of many countries for child predators, traders in child porn, threats to governments, and for extreme political statements of every kind. Doing what these young men supposedly did is comparable to trying to build a bomb in a department-store display window on a busy avenue. Well, maybe they are not very bright, and we do still need to be protected from people who are not very bright, but the bizarre nature of the accusations against them is suggested by statements from a lawyer for one of the accused. While formal charges have not been produced and lawyers for the accused have received no discovery information, the lawyers were permitted, in a Darkness at Noon fashion, to read but not copy a synopsis of accusations which I understand is typically prepared by police. Apparently, such synopses have a history of great inaccuracy when compared to actual legal charges finally submitted in court. I believe that it was with this in mind and with the intention of alerting the thinking public to some odd stuff that a lawyer for one of the accused stood outside the court and recited some of the accusations. The points include a wish to behead the Prime Minister, take government hostages, blow up part of Parliament, and attack the CBC. Behead the Prime Minister? There is not the least justification yet for any of these words. We must keep in mind that a group of unhappy young men can easily be manipulated by a clever intelligence agent or policeman. Seduction and psychological manipulation are at the very heart of producing what is called human intelligence. There is often a rather fine line between young conspirators being observed by undercover agents and foolish young men being manipulated into incriminating themselves. God, they seem to have descended like a great ugly flock of grief counselors, another questionable kind of expert, following a school killing. I heard two terror experts on CBC radio. One an ex-British soldier and another an ex-CSIS official, both earning their livings now by selling security to private firms and governments. Ask an insurance agent whether you have enough life insurance and what response can you anticipate with virtually one-hundred percent certainty? These experts warn of undefined fears, as in, who knows how many others are "out there"? Well, who knows how many dishonest terror experts there are out there hawking fear? The ex-CSIS man did it more subtly and gracefully than the ex-soldier, but shadowy nonsense remains shadowy nonsense, no matter the tone and vocabulary. The ex-CSIS man questioned the future application to Canada of a favorite expression of mine, "the peaceable kingdom," while offering absolutely nothing of substance to warrant his statement. Even if these young men are guilty of crimes, how is their case so different to that of a man in Montreal who shot fourteen women one day or a pig farmer outside Vancouver whose hobby for years was luring with drugs dozens of prostitutes to their deaths? Does political anger make it different? A violent crime is a crime, and those found guilty should be separated from society. What we have here is the demonstrated wisdom of keeping an eye on Internet chat sites and on people doing questionable activities, but that is the case for many crimes we emphasize more than we once did, as with child pornography. There is no reason for a special fear to take hold when the subject is terror. It is dangerous and destructive of our best values. We know that a true and effective terrorist organization like the IRA always keeps its business utterly secret. Those suspected of informing are murdered without hesitation. Some of these "experts" have experience in Israel, but everything that comes out of Israel on the subject of terror resembles a script prepared by the state security apparatus. Israel vigorously promotes the idea of terror in the world the way some countries promote tourism. It is simply in its interest. Many of the firms for which the experts work were founded by men like Henry Kissinger and William Colby as ways of keeping a high income in retirement and an oar in the waters of intrigue. The intentions of such firms are entirely suspect. In some cases the firms may well serve as ways for American intelligence to penetrate the existing security of unsuspecting firms and governments, at home and abroad. Why do I describe American attitudes as erratic and uninformed? This starts at the beginning with the Sons of Liberty before the American Revolution beating and tar-and-feathering officials in the colonies who were just doing their duty for what was then the legal government. The same fate fell to Loyalists after the war. They were beaten, often burned-out, always run from their homes, and had their property stolen. There are many, many examples of this kind of terror in American history, another notable one being Cosa Nostra, whose violent operations were long ignored by an FBI busy tracking left-leaning school teachers. America has never winced at supporting terror in other places for causes with which it felt sympathy. The greatest example of this was decades of lavish support for the IRA. Politicians and police were aware of this and did nothing, indeed some of them undoubtedly were contributors. The most dreadful terror associated with America has been the state terror of its long series of colonial wars after World War II. Sometimes the terror is delegated to proxies, financed, trained, and given weapons and intelligence by the American government. This was the case in Chile, Guatemala, El Salvador, and a dozen other hells. Millions were spent by the CIA subsidizing thugs in Florida who carried out bombings and shootings in Cuba. State Department officials are reported to have been on phones late into the night transmitting lists of names for the slaughter. Vietnam was "hands-on" terror. Countless carpet bombings, search-and-destroy missions, napalmings, night-crawler assassinations, and other horrors chalked up maybe three million victims in an undeclared war against people in their own land. Along the way, interrogated suspects were thrown from helicopters and unknown thousands of helpless village women were raped and murdered. A great crime was committed, and any criminals who survived deserved to be brought to justice. But that was not what happened. Instead two Muslim nations were invaded, tens of thousands killed, a giant, secret kidnapping-and-torture organization established, and many civil liberties cast aside. This is not a model for Canada or any civilized society. However, that is not the same thing as recognizing that great numbers of angry young men, here and abroad, are a symptom of something being very wrong. Unless they are psychopaths, people do not just suddenly decide to blow things up. If they are psychopaths, then what they do cannot be called political and cannot be labeled as terrorism. America was advised privately, before its invasions, by many who understood that one result would be a huge wave of anger and alienation in the Muslim world. The fact is that U. It has pressured a number of allies, notably Canada and Great Britain, to help cover this gradual withdrawal. It fought a "cheap" war in Afghanistan, using warlords every bit as nasty as the Taleban to gain a quick victory, and there is almost no possibility of constructing a modern democratic state from the remains. I do believe we will see justice for the young men in Canada with nothing but facts determining their fate. Canadians are a sensible and decent people. At the same time, I hope Canadians consider more carefully the deeply flawed policies Bush has imposed on the world. Two ancient Muslim nations are occupied and smoldering with resentment amidst economic ruin. Iraq has been driven into the destructive beginnings of civil war. The country still does not have even dependable water or electricity. Palestinians are treated worse today by Israel, with smiling American acquiescence, than black Africans were under apartheid, and there is no hint of a just end to the situation. And the learning curve in guerilla fighting means nothing but more intense attacks against foreign armies in Afghanistan and Iraq. Robert Fisk, the superb British journalist on Middle East affairs, had a fascinating column recently. He explained how at the Baghdad morgue, one of whose officials he knows, there are standing orders that bodies brought in by Americans are not to be autopsied. The bodies often come tagged with a cursory description of the cause of death along the lines of extreme trauma. This is the kind of gruesome, revealing detail you will never see broadcast on American networks. A large number of Iraqi scientists previously associated with weapons programs have been mysteriously murdered, almost certainly the work of Mossad being given a free hand in the country. Americans may be unaware of what is being done in their name, but the people of Western Asia are well aware of it, and memories in the Middle East are long. Did you like this article?

A senior at Barnard College pushes the bounds of social progress in this op-ed in the student paper. She concedes that the number of transgender Americans capable of attending college is vanishingly small, but Something Must Be Done all the same. The logical response is developing an affirmative action policy for non-gender conforming students at Barnard. An inclusive admission policy for trans women would appear a good first step, but will likely prove insufficient to building a greater trans presence on campus. A majority of us, however, appear more invested in acclimating to norms. Critical thought becomes endangered when we instead prioritize being understood and included. The tendency to apply gender binaries propagates uncreative scholarship. An affirmative action policy for non-gender conforming students assures learning that is more worldly, creative, and insightful. Rather, their open self-identification as trans, in a society hostile or indifferent, epitomizes the boldness that Barnard values. The college needs more than a handful of non-gender conforming students to instigate more courageous and innovative learning. As Jon Chait said: Claims of victimhood that are useful within the left-wing subculture may alienate much of America. Ross Douthat, though, points out that political correctness sometimes works very well. If you look at the place where the left has won arguably its biggest political-cultural victory lately, the debate over same-sex marriage, you can see an obvious example of this dynamic playing out. Was there a time, in a more divided and socially conservative America, when the P. I very much doubt it; it seems to that the cause has enough cultural momentum behind it that using taboos to marginalize its few remaining critics is likely to, well, work. Of course she does not mean, not in the slightest, that she wants to encounter difference in any non-progressive way. I am confident that she does not want to encounter the point of view of the white working-class Arkansas Baptist, or the black prosperity-gospel-believing Pentecostal, or the Republican frat boy from Alpharetta, and so forth. It honestly never occurred to them that someone they actually enjoyed talking to, and felt warmly towards, could fail to believe what all intelligent, civilized people believed. I could tell that I confounded and distressed these Manhattanites. They were all for diversity, but for the right kind of diversity, not the diversity that includes people like me. Believe me, a lot of us on the cultural right get this. I spoke to a friend of mine not long ago, a guy who teaches philosophy, and who has written at a very high level about human nature, marriage, and sexuality he is a Catholic who believes what the Catholic Church teaches. Again, this is not a newspaper polemicist, but a professional philosopher working within academia. Thus the Law of Merited Impossibility. It depends on the illiberal left believing on the one hand that it is not censorious, McCarthyite types, while at the same time believing that virtue requires it to censor and blacklist those guilty of wrongthink. This proposal was rejected in favor of an alternative: Some such notes have been sent, I am told; they include links to the relevant sites and say something along the following lines: Daily Nous commenter Joshua Miller writes under this item: I think we should both endorse and act on the claim that admitting error for previously held and promoted beliefs is extremely valuable. Perhaps even it already has! Note that I publish under my own name. Elsewhere on that comments thread, this: But whether it is appropriate or not, I expect this sort of thing i. I imagine that current graduate students, armed with google, will be looking here, at Leiter, the other blogs, the reddit philosophy communities, etc. Hi classmates at my mid-range Leiterrific department!! Current graduate students and others on the job market should probably take note: Happily, most of the commenters on that site think that treating this anonymous grad student in this way is wrong. Well, I guess this means that I should stop applying to tenure-track positions in philosophy. Still, I will have a talk with my teenage son today to tell him not to defend anything that might be remotely controversial online, unless he does it under a false name, and leaves no identifying details. Six to eight years from now, when he will be applying for a job or to graduate school, someone, somewhere, will Google him. If he has ever said anything that violates the progressive code, he may be sunk. Much depends on old-fashioned liberals finding their voice, and standing up for old-fashioned liberalism and values like free speech and free thought.
