The first edition of the Texas Almanac was published by the News in Galveston in January , only twelve years after Texas became the twenty-eighth state to enter the Union. The idea to publish an annual almanac to attract immigrants to Texas and inform residents about their state was conceived in by David Richardson , a native of England who had been hired to work for the News a few years earlier by its owner, Willard Richardson. The two Richardsons, who were not related, eventually became partners in both the newspaper and the Texas Almanac. They included many first-person accounts of the Texas Revolution , the Republic of Texas , and the early days of statehood, as well as biographies of early Texas leaders. Each edition included an astronomical calendar, a feature that continues to the present day. Some of the first editions also contained illustrations, such as depictions of the state Capitol and portraits of notable Texans, as well as illustrated advertisements. Advertisements during this era included services, such as hotels, shippers, printers, and insurance companies; and goods, such as stoves, plows, cotton gins, carriages, tonics, tools, housewares, garden seed, and eyeglasses.
