In lieu of an abstract, here is a brief excerpt of the content: The Journal of Military History Oxford University Press, The Royal Australian Air Force. The Royal Australian Navy. Edited by David Stevens. Making the Australian Defence Force. The Department of Defence. By Joan Beaumont et al. Their contribution to the bicentenary of white occupation of the continent in , Australians: A Historical Library, was a ten-volume opportunity for good and popular history. The narrative technique was for a [End Page ] volume at each fifty-year stage of the two hundred years, concentrating steadily on that single year rather than looking about more generally. Periodisation as rigid as this overlooked war. The volume "From " which broke the rigidity somewhat did look at the second world war from a war and society context but the series omitted the first world war entirely from its narrative volumes. You can imagine that Australian military historians chafed under this celebratory rigidity and it is hardly surprising that they were to the fore when discussion began about what contribution Australian historians would make to the centenary of federation celebrations, in effect marking the making of a nation. Leadership from senior historians at the Australian Defence Force Academy saw the acceptance of The Australian Centenary History of Defence, not as war history only, but a comprehensive study of Defence in the story of Australia. As series editors Peter Dennis and John Coates point out: So this seven-volume series of elegantly designed, pleasingly illustrated histories emerged as a major contribution to the centenary celebrations. There is no striving for effect in this series. Each of the services receives its own volume; there is a study, too, of the organisational side of defence, the military-civilian interface; there is a volume of sources and statistics; and a military atlas. There is not too much straining for effect, either, in the choice of writers. Again the choices are sensible and straightforward. Does all this sound too dull, too reliable? In a sense I suppose it might. It was unwise, I think, to ask Jeffrey Grey to gird his loins again to write about the Australian army. He might have said to the editors that there was little more he could add to what he had already said in numerous books around the same theme, such as his well-received A Military History of Australia. Oxford University Press, , pp. The Great War, a monumental clash among nations, utilized paradigm-shifting weaponry at the beginning of the twentieth century, resulting in unfathomable carnage and suffering. The brutality of this new era of warfare saw rapidly changing doctrines and strategies that sought to capitalize on newly developed weaponry for offensive and defensive purposes. One such weapon--the "aeroplane"--played a fundamental role in changing strategies, operations, and tactics. Leading the charge for airpower and its employment in the battlespace was Great Britain. Australia and the War in the Air is the first of five volumes in The Centenary History of Australia and the Great War series, devoted to a historical account of the First World War written from an Australian-centric view. Author Michael Molkentin had originally written this manuscript as a PhD dissertation and then expanded its scope and depth with the assistance of funding from his university and the Australian Army. That said, Molkentin provides a comprehensive and scholarly review of how the Australian public and military became interested in aviation for defensive purposes. Nevertheless, such efforts as well as the failed Gallipoli Campaign were vital to facilitating Australian identity and eventual independence. Most of the text is devoted to thorough examinations of major air-ground battles along the western front, the failed British campaign in Mesopotamia, and the British push from Egypt into Palestine. Showing how aircraft were initially used for aerial reconnaissance and artillery spotting, Molkentin describes how leadership in each region adopted varying tactics to employ aircraft based on climate, terrain, and logistics. As the war progressed, technology permitted aircraft to engage in air combat, and tactical close air support evolved into ground strafing and trench strafing, including opportunistic bombing, mapping, and other reconnaissance. He finds that ace was invented in the late s by cinema and that such a term would have been considered "vulgar" p. Given that this text was underwritten by the Australian military, many readers may find it skewed toward Australian airmen and their role in aviation operations across the western front and the Middle East. Nevertheless, Molkentin does redeem himself on numerous occasions by dispelling commonly held beliefs about exaggerated Australian contributions to the Great War--for example, an analysis of the performance of Australian and British aviation units shows them to be comparable in combat, among other metrics. Finally, the text does an admirable job of reassessing the great airpower theorist Marshal of the RAF Hugh Trenchard and his application of airpower along the western front. This examination highlights his poor decisions concerning organization of the flying squadrons and his blind commitment to strategic bombing. Conversely, Molkentin praises Trenchard for his overall belief in unrelenting offensive operations through decentralized execution at the squadron level. Regardless of its focus, it effectively demonstrates many origins of the modern-day uses of airpower, describing how its role developed and evolved as aircraft capabilities grew by leaps and bounds during the Great War. Readers with an appetite for discovering insights into Commonwealth military aviation and its "birth pains" will appreciate Australia and the War in the Air for its in-depth analysis of World War I campaigns that utilized airpower. Molkentin is candid about this assertion in assessments of each side, finding through diaries and official correspondence that airpower was mostly decisive in undermining enemy morale and disrupting the organization of ground troops. Military leaders will appreciate Australia and the War in the Air for its ability to identify issues that still face airmen when they deploy aircraft and personnel to a combat zone.
