

1: The Boss's Daughter () - IMDb

Directed by David Zucker. With Ashton Kutcher, Tara Reid, Andy Richter, Molly Shannon. When a young man agrees to housesit for his boss, he thinks it'll be the perfect opportunity to get close to the woman he desperately has a crush on - his boss's daughter.

I love my job, but dislike working with her as she tells only one side of the story to her parents. I accepted a job working in the same place as my husband. I am in a management position. He manages the outside side of the business, I manage the office. She has never accepted me. I am in a new town, where no one knows me. I have had an exemplary work record with no issues. I am just wondering at what point you throw in the towel. Do parents see children for what they are? Several months ago she sent an e-mail to her mother and accidentally sent it to a group list that included family, random people at another business owned by the owner and other coworkers. Do you have any advice? I have never been in such an odd predicament. We hear from many people who are frustrated at the special treatment given by owners of businesses to their relatives, especially their adult children. On the other hand, it seems like a shame to quit a good paying job you normally would like, just because of one person. Her position there may not last forever, no matter how stable it appears now. If the daughter is the only one you are having serious conflict with, perhaps you can find a way to simply tolerate her, for the sake of keeping a job that allows you to work near your husband. Your concerns seem to mostly involve dislike for her and her manipulations. You probably got some sympathy out of that! If you think her attitude is going to cause you to get fired, you will need to be in a more defensive mode. I often mention the three ways to develop influence: Be credible, be valuable and communicate effectively. If you put your efforts into those three areas, you will gain enough support from others that your position will be solid. This may sound crass to some, but I have seen it be the case in many businesses: Often an adult child in that situation is no different than if the owners brought a pet to work. When the owners think their child is hurting business, they might do something. If you have someplace better to go, quitting may be worthwhile. Best wishes to you. If you have the time and wish to do so, let us know what happens. Gorden has this advice, which varies a bit from mineâ€”but adds very good perspectives. Family businesses often pose difficult issues for non-family employees, as you are now experiencing. How long is it before you throw in the towel? Only you can answer your question. Probably you know it is wisest that you should stick with your office manager job until you have a solid offer of another. Can you stick it out until you find another job? Yes, you can and should. You probably would spell a job description to her, including load and hours she should work, and give her a probation period to prove she should be a permanent employee. If you choose to fight her, that need not be a knock down knock out fight. You are a mature individual with a good record who now is in a position you love except for this frustrating family member. You have a sense of what is fair and what is required if this family business is to succeed. You can see the big picture; to make it a business that pleases its customers and that is best achieved when every employee works together as a team. Your challenge is to clarify and to engage this daughter and owner in that. You have a voice and I gather that so far you have bit your tongue. Take time to log what is not good performance and to outline what you think is fair. Such a confrontation, of course, is a direct approach, and it is not a quick fix, one time solution. An indirect approach, that might be more effective and determinant to whether or not you choose to leave, is a quality improvement lean management approach. Almost every business, including family business, can improve on ways to better serve its customers by improving its products and quality. Concurrently almost every business can save money and make more money by cutting wasted supplies, wasted, time, wasted energy and wasted money on the one hand and finding ways to innovate on the other. Thinking and acting solo; that is what I can do; is important but not as effective as is a company-wide, team-wide effort. You might think through what you would do if you owned this company, how you would bring, rather than knock, heads together to create a customer-friendly, coworker-engaged, lean-managed workplace-wide thriving enterprise. If this indirect approach could capture your imagination and in turn you could persuade the owners of your company of its value, I predict the problem daughter would be resolved. Might both the direct and indirect approach speak to your Wits End? Or
