Mother of the Bride: Before you go shopping for your mother of the bride dress ease your mind with these top etiquette tips. Her choice is meant to subtly dictate what the mother of the groom will wear. However, this approach can be a little old-fashioned, not to mention a little unrealistic. Just play it by ear, and try to be flexible. Old-school wedding etiquette says "yes. That said, the mother of the groom might really appreciate -- and even expect -- a heads up. You can either have your daughter subtly pass the details along, or, better yet, give her a call yourself. Try to sound as friendly and non-territorial as possible: Divorced family situations can get sticky. We think black is classic, chic, and formal, and know that even red can be done with gorgeous good taste. Before you start shopping, talk to the bride. She may be very sensitive to the color issue or completely indifferent. If she expresses reservation, think about subdued-but-stately colors in the lavender, silver, burgundy, and blue families. Some will swear by the "rule" that all the dresses must coordinate. And some brides really love that matchy-matchy look. But there are countless alternatives. Maybe stay within one color spectrum -- if the bridesmaids dresses are baby blue, for instance, the mother of the bride can wear navy. But mixing and matching can be ultra-stylish, too. She may also have ideas about style, length, and formality. Keep her guidelines in mind while shopping, but the dress you settle on should make you happy, too. How far in advance should the Mother of the Bride purchase her dress? Start dress shopping as soon as possible. There are many frill-free formal looks out there. Can a young-looking MOB wear a strapless ball gown -- is there such a thing as looking too young or sexy? But if your daughter seems concerned about "Mommy" turning heads, not acting her age, and otherwise upstaging her, let her be selfish.

2: Q&A: Mother of the Bride Dresses

The bride getting ready, groomsmen portraits, first dance, cake cutting and portraits of the bride and groom. Black and white film captures these timeless moments," says Lacie Hansen.

Royal brides before Victoria did not typically wear white, instead choosing "heavy brocaded gowns embroidered with white and silver thread," with red being a particularly popular colour in Western Europe more generally. In ancient Greece, white was the color of bridal joy, and brides not only wore white dresses and white flowers, but they also painted their bodies white. By the end of the 19th century the white dress was the garment of choice for elite brides on both sides of the Atlantic. As historian Vicky Howard writes, "[i]f a bride wore white in the nineteenth century, it was acceptable and likely that she wore her gown again". Today a whole industry surrounds the provision of such weddings. The full white wedding experience today typically requires the family to arrange for or purchase printed or engraved wedding invitations , musicians, decorations such as flowers or candles, clothes and flowers for bridesmaids , groomsmen , a flower girl , and a ring bearer. They may also add optional features, such as a guest book or commemorative wedding leaflets. It is common to have a celebration after the wedding ceremony, normally featuring a large white wedding cake.

Participants[edit] Traditional weddings require, in addition to the bride and groom , a marriage officiant , which is a minister, priest, rabbi, imam, or civil officer who is authorized to perform marriages. Typical white weddings also include a wedding party , which consists of some or all of the following: One or more friends or family members who assist the groom, usually men. The chief groomsmen is called the best man , and is given a place of honor. A woman such as the sister of the groom is called an honor attendant. One or more friends or family members who support the bride. The chief bridesmaid may be called a maid of honor or matron of honor. A girl too young to be marriageable, but too old to be a flower girl, is called a junior bridesmaid. A young girl who scatters flowers in front of the bridal party. An attendant, often a young boy, who carries the wedding rings. Typically, these positions are filled by close friends of the bride and groom; being asked to serve in these capacities is seen as an honor, and typically entails some expense. The ceremony[edit] The bride and groom stand at the altar during the wedding ceremony, surrounded by the bridesmaids and groomsmen. When the guests arrive for a wedding, the ushers, if any, help the guests take their places. In a typical white wedding ceremony, which is derived primarily from the Anglican tradition, the bride and groom will stand side by side at the front of the church or other venue throughout most or all the ceremony. Consequently, some guests prefer to sit on the side closer to the person they know best. The front rows are generally reserved for close family members or friends. Some couples make a ceremony of having their grandparents, step-parents, and parents escorted to their seats immediately before the wedding procession begins. In other cases, these relatives form part of the wedding procession. Depending on the country, her age and situation, and her personal preferences, the bride may walk alone or be escorted by her father, both of her parents, one or more relatives she wishes to honor, or the groom. In Swedish white weddings, the bride and groom usually go down the aisle together. Whether the bride is the first or the last of the wedding party to enter the church varies by country. In the US, the bride is typically last, being preceded by the rest of the wedding party. In the UK, she leads the procession, followed by any bridesmaids , flower girls and page boys. Sometimes the groom is already present in the church; other times, he and any groomsmen form part of the procession. The music played during this procession is commonly called a wedding march , no matter what songs are played. If the wedding is part of a religious service, then technically the service begins after the arrival of the participants, commonly with a prayer, blessing, or ritual greeting. During the ceremony, each partner in the couple makes marriage vows to the other in front of the marriage officiant. The ceremony might include the singing of hymns or performance of a popular song , a Bible reading, or a poem. After the wedding ceremony itself ends, the bride, groom, officiant, and two witnesses generally go off to a side room to sign the wedding register in the United Kingdom or the state-issued marriage license in the United States. Without the signing of the register or the marriage license, the marriage is not legally recognized. Afterward, guests may cheer the departure of the couple from the church by throwing flower petals , confetti , birdseed , or rice over
