City doctor in the Outback Dr. Abby Hampton is the ultimate city doctor, and is absolutely dreading being stuck in a bush hospital for three monthsâ€”until she steps off the plane!

Waiting times for emergency hospital care are also getting worse in rural areas but improving in major cities. If you live in the country, your GP is more likely to have qualified in Europe, the Indian sub-continent, or Asia, than Australia. These GPs fill an important gap; in the absence of effective policies to encourage Australian-trained GPs to work in rural areas, we will continue to rely on overseas-trained doctors for some time. This is a very cost-effective policy for Australia, but the ethics of depleting the supply of doctors from developing countries are murky. Many of these doctors want to eventually work in the city, and so they are difficult to retain once their obligatory time in the bush is completed. Yet after each review, we find ourselves in the same position: Waiting times for emergency hospital care are getting worse in rural areas. A lack of any proper and rigorous evaluation means that we cannot move on because we do not know if anything has changed. In the meantime, rural waiting lists are getting longer and health inequities widen between those living in rural and metropolitan areas, suggesting we need to do more. Not just money Persuading a doctor to move to the bush, or to persuade doctors already there to stay, depends on a complex mix of family, professional, and social factors. Funding can be paid directly to GPs, or can be used to fund locum cover replacement doctors or other means of support. But improved working conditions would reduce this amount. Financial incentives are certainly not the only way to recruit and retain doctors in the bush. These six indicators have been used to develop a new rural classification system based on population size, which will be developed further over the coming months. This new system will be used to improve the allocation of funding for rural incentive schemes. The areas that have higher needs than others â€” poorer health and worse risk factors for disease, longer waiting times, and GPs who working long hours and provide hour care â€” should therefore receive a greater level of funding to attract more doctors. Better targeting of incentives should mean that areas that really need a doctor are more likely to get one. But to demonstrate this and ensure the goals are being met, we need good evaluation built into the program roll-out. Policymakers are often too keen to get the money out of the door than spend some time and money building in proper evaluation. This needs to change, otherwise we will be having the same discussion in five to ten years time.
