Poetry on the page simply can't compare with the authors reading it themselves, and that includes those scratchy 19th-century recordings from the British Library sound archives. Tennyson, less.

The impression clearly given by St. Bede is that he lacked the knowledge of how to compose the lyrics to songs. While asleep, he had a dream in which "someone" quidam approached him and asked him to sing principium creaturarum, "the beginning of created things. He told his foreman about his dream and gift and was taken immediately to see the abbess, believed to be St Hilda of Whitby. Although he is often listed as a saint, this is not confirmed by Bede and it has recently been argued that such assertions are incorrect. Taken together, this evidence suggests an active period beginning between and and ending between and Hilda, the original abbey fell to a Viking attack in and was abandoned. Scribes other than those responsible for the main text often copy the vernacular text of the Hymn in manuscripts of the Latin Historia. With the exception of the Old English translation, no single recension of the Historia ecclesiastica is characterised by the presence of a particular recension of the vernacular poem. The text has been normalised to show a line-break between each line and modern word-division. A transcription of the likely pronunciation of the text in the early 8th-century Northumbrian dialect in which the text is written is included, along with a modern English translation. Nunc laudare debemus auctorem regni caelestis, potentiam creatoris, et consilium illius facta Patris gloriae: There are a number of verse texts known to have been composed by Cynewulf, but we know nothing of his biography. No study appears to exist of the "named" Anglo-Saxon poets—the list here has been compiled from Frank, Opland, Sisam and Robinson Retrieved 24 October The most recent edition is Colgrave and Mynors

The public library was a short walk away from our house, and it had an admirably complete collection of vintage Caedmon recordings. Unfortunately, while I was studying English lit. And the Caedmon recordings--which I played nonstop, at every waking moment--nearly drove him crazy, although he was polite enough to keep this fact from me for nearly twenty years. And I know another writer whose appreciation for John Donne skyrocketed once he heard Richard Burton reading Donne on the Caedmon label. Perhaps improbably, he agreed it was undoubtedly an astute move to meet him in a bar. He had found the draw of the White Horse Tavern en route to the session to be too great to ignore. At first, the two women did all the work, from running the recording sessions to mailing out the orders. In time, their sales grew enough to hire a staff. Eliot, Carl Sandburg and e. Roney and Cohen sold Caedmon in , and today it is a part of the HarperCollins publishing company.
