During the NFB: AE Conference held in Vancouver, a workshop on existing dog guide legislation in Canada took place. This session was intended to examine existing legislation and to develop content for an ideal dog guide statute in preparation for anticipated consultations in Alberta and for use in other provinces and territories across Canada. In this article, Devon Wilkins summarizes both presentations, beginning with her overview of the current status of legislation throughout Canada. Of those four, Nova Scotia was the only province that had the foresight to include other types of assistance dogs. Alberta amended its Act once to include hearing dogs. The Northwest Territories had not enacted legislation to provide protection for people with guide dogs, but allowing them into public buildings was common practice. It also makes it illegal for anyone to levy an extra charge against a blind person because of the presence of a guide dog. As well as expanding protection to cover all types of assistance dogs, Wilkins recommended that future legislation should follow the lead of States such as New Mexico and Washington. It is also illegal for animal rights activists to grab hold of a guide dog and turn it loose, as happened to one Seattle woman. In a brief reference to municipalities, Wilkins suggested that people with disabilities should not be exempted from "poop and scoop" bylaws, because too many people without disabilities may be quick to take advantage of such bylaws. Unfortunately, as is too often the case, there was no consultation between the law-makers and the people who would benefit from the legislation. But, at the National Dog Guide Conference, a representative of the committee made a presentation and it became quite obvious that there was some dissension, even within the committee itself, as to the direction that should be taken. In , twenty-three stakeholder groups sat down to review a draft proposed by the Office of Disability Issues in Victoria. It was fortunate that we were all pretty much on the same page in terms of the changes we wanted. Sleath went on to say that when everyone had been consulted and the first draft came back, the big concern was the use of such terms as guide animals, service animals, and hearing assistance animals. Stakeholders worried that the term "animal", which was not defined in the draft, could include anything from a guide horse to a trained pot-bellied pig. We eventually changed the draft legislation to include dogs, and dogs only. Sleath concluded by saying that the stakeholders feel quite confident that they have the support of the incoming Attorney-General, but that there are still two areas of concern. The stakeholders compare a retired working dog to a parent who is all of a sudden a senior. The second concern is that the current draft legislation says that assistance dogs have access to hotels, motels, inns, and resorts, except when the owner is living on the property or when there are less than five rooms. The stakeholders argue that a lot of the smaller motels in BC are what Sleath called "mom and pop operations" and many more are bed-and-breakfasts. Sleath said that if these concerns can be addressed before the draft finds its way to the legislative council, the new Act should become law either in the upcoming sitting or the next. Sleath and Wilkins agreed with a suggestion from the audience that if you want to avoid any nasty surprises, it is always a good idea to check out the legislation in the jurisdiction in which you plan to travel.
