The Childs Love of Mystery. Maureen Stowell Commented on July 14, I love this story. I try to help Early Education Teacher understand that it is the journey of an adventure that sparks the children's imagination and wonder.

Why have so many children — some still infants — been infected with the virus? But in the first two weeks of October, nearly 60 percent of the newly reported cases in and around Beni were children under the age of 16, Dr. Nine of the children were under the age of 5. Sign up for our Daily Recap newsletter Please enter a valid email address. Overall there have been confirmed and probable cases in this outbreak, which is believed to have begun in July. Of those infections, have been fatal. At this point, they have a theory — though Salama stressed that it is only that at this stage. It is currently peak malaria season in Beni. Children in particular can become severely ill when they contract malaria. And it appears that a lot of the children who contracted Ebola in Beni had recently seen medical practitioners or traditional healers. If a clinic or traditional healer is treating an undiagnosed Ebola patient, other people also present could become infected. That is believed to have happened recently to a plumber who worked on the U. Ebola experts from CDC were pulled from outbreak zone amid security concern Some of the children have died at home, which puts the family members who looked after them at grave risk. But others have been brought to Ebola treatment centers, Salama said. The emergency medical response group Alima is operating the Ebola treatment center at Beni and, for the first time in an Ebola outbreak, has started to use an innovative new approach to build community trust and encourage people to bring sick loved ones in for care, Salama said. That approach is built around a cube — a contained, clear enclosure in which a patient receives care. Medical personnel remain outside the cube, but can reach inside through gloved ports to deliver care. The emergency medical response group Alima is using specially designed cubes to deliver care to patients. And that, combined with security problems, have resulted in a worrying turn of events: Knowing where the virus is spreading is critical to controlling an outbreak. Over the past three or four weeks, a growing proportion of cases have been people who were not identified as contacts of previous cases. And increasingly, even retrospective attempts to figure out how these people became infected are failing to chart the links. WHO raises concerns over Ebola outbreak, but declines to declare a global health emergency Response coordinators are exploring the possibility of using rapid genome sequencing of viruses to try to bolster their flagging surveillance efforts, he said. Comparing the genetic blueprint of a virus to others in the outbreak can show if a new infection is part of an established chain of transmission, or is perhaps a sign other transmission chains have been spreading disease undetected. The WHO is discussing the issue with the ministry of health, looking for agreement.

2: An Ebola outbreak presents a new mystery involving children - STAT

*Children are "the great disrupters, the great interrupters, who humanize us along the way," says Marty, who has crafted his most recent book, The Mystery of the Child (, Wm. B. Eerdmans Publishing Co.), as an antidote to the ubiquitous "how-to" guides for caretakers.*

During the Middle Ages it belonged to the Abbey of Bury St Edmunds , and was part of one of the most densely populated areas in rural England. Two writers, Ralph of Coggeshall died c. William was a canon at the Augustinian Newburgh Priory , far to the north in Yorkshire. William states that the account given in his Historia rerum Anglicarum c. The accounts given by the two authors differ in some details. Ralph reports that the children were taken to the home of Richard de Calne. Ralph and William agree that the pair refused all food for several days until they came across some raw broad beans , which they consumed eagerly. Ralph says that they had become lost when they followed the cattle into a cave and, after being guided by the sound of bells, eventually emerged into our land. The first is that the narrative descends from folklore , describing an imaginary encounter with the inhabitants of a "fairy Otherworld". Gerald of Wales tells a similar story of a boy who, after escaping his master, "encountered two pigmies who led him through an underground passage into a beautiful land with fields and rivers, but not lit by the full light of the sun". Baughman lists it as the only example of his F Fleeing from the wood in which they were abandoned, possibly nearby Thetford Forest , the children fell into the pits at Woolpit where they were discovered. In a article published in the magazine Analog , astronomer Duncan Lunan hypothesised that the children were accidentally transported to Woolpit from their home planet as the result of a "matter transmitter" malfunction. Robert Burton suggested in his The Anatomy of Melancholy that the green children "fell from Heaven", an idea that seems to have been picked up by Francis Godwin , historian and Bishop of Hereford, in his speculative fiction The Man in the Moone , [1] published posthumously in They may have fled and ultimately wandered to Woolpit. Disoriented, bewildered, and dressed in unfamiliar Flemish clothes, the children would have presented a very strange spectacle to the Woolpit villagers. For instance, he suggests it is unlikely that an educated local man like Richard de Calne would not have recognised the language spoken by the children as being Flemish. The likely core of the matter is that these very small children, herding or following flocks, strayed from their forest village, spoke little, and in modern terms did not know their own home address. They were probably suffering from chlorosis, a deficiency disease which gives the skin a greenish tint, hence the term "green sickness". With a better diet it disappears. The Green Children resurface another story that William had been unable to tell, one in which English paninsular dominion becomes a troubled assumption rather than a foregone conclusion. The green children become a source of interest to the main character, Crispin Clare, along with some other characters from the Latin accounts of William of Newburgh, Gervase of Tilbury, and others, and Stow includes translations from those texts: In some accounts he is named Richard de Caine.

You may remember a mystery that had health officials and the Centers for Disease Control (CDC) perplexed a few summers back. We covered the story here. During the summer of , people (mostly children) in California were getting sick and some, as a result, were becoming paralyzed.

How he writes such successful novels so consistently is the mystery our Armen Keteyian set out to investigate: When it comes to second acts in life, there are few more remarkable than the one author Lee Child has written for himself. The world famous mystery writer said the odds were against him: Because Lee Child is arguably the hottest mystery writer around. His books jump straight to the best-seller list. His 15 high-octane thrillers have sold more than 40 million copies in 75 countries, translated into 38 languages. Somebody is reading one of those books. His birth name was Jim Grant. A rebirth of a career? Child was born in England in , the son of a civil servant. While far from poor, the family lived paycheck to paycheck. You know, they were that kind of family, that kind of generation that really revered education. He got a job in British television, and for 18 years worked on such high-brow, high-profile projects as "Brideshead Revisited," and mysteries like "Prime Suspect. But I was fired. And I thought, well, you know, I know the audience. I know how they think. In 5 months Jim Grant - reborn as Lee Child - wrote his first novel. Army military cop named Jack Reacher. He is who he is. Would you reach me that can? They show up everywhere. A film version of one is now in the works. And if you want to see what Jack Reacher might actually look like. He recently won a Reacher look-alike contest. Somebody else will like it. Maybe thousands of people. Maybe tens of thousands of people.

4: The Mystery Child - BLIND GOSSIP

"Worth Dying For" is the latest mystery from Lee Child. He's the author of a string of best-sellers, including "61 Hours," out last May and still number three on the list.

Sunday, October 7, The mummy is assumed to be a girl that lived around CE during the Roman period in Egypt. The scans will be used to create a 3-D model for researchers to further investigate. There was nothing remarkable about the foam-core box. It held a 2-year-old treasure: Penn Museum staff already knew some things about the ancient remains. They believe the remains are of a girl, based on the painted decorations on the plaster mask and linen shroud. She lived about to AD "a "newer mummy," given that she was born roughly 1, years after King Tut. The style of her shroud indicates she lived in a region of Egypt under Roman control at the time near what is now the city of Luxor. An X-ray, taken about a year ago, revealed "skeletal abnormalities," anthropologist Samantha Cox noted. She would soon find out. Ancient Egyptians practiced some form of mummification over a span of 5, years. Typically, the internal organs were removed and the body was "dried out" by packing it in salt for about 70 days. Then the body was "anointed with oils" and wrapped in layers of linen, which is painted with designs that protect the dead, said Wegner. At a CHOP loading dock, security guards rolled out a child-sized hospital gurney draped with a blue sheet. Wegner and Mathieu carefully carried the mummy from the back of the car to the gurney. The group maneuvered to a different back entrance. Once upstairs in radiology, museum staff opened the box, removing bubble wrap and paper tissue to reveal the tiny mummy with an ornate mask and linen painted with images of Anubis, a funerary god in the form of a jackal, and Sokar, a god shaped like a falcon, along with lotus flowers, a symbol of birth and regeneration. CHOP radiologic technologist Felicia Williams, wearing purple rubber gloves, positioned the mummy and then went into an adjoining control room to run the CT machine, the outside of which was painted with colorful zoo animals. Williams took 5, images in horizontal and vertical slices, which are then layered together to form a 3-D reconstruction. Within minutes, the team of radiologists and anthropologists huddled around computers said they could see that some of her organs were still there. Cox said she is pretty sure the damage to the skull occurred long after death. Archaeologists excavated her sometime in the late 19th century. It might be from when they excavated her and they kind of knocked things around. Cox said they will continue to study the CT images closely in coming weeks to see what other mysteries "or answers " the mummy may yield. The public will have a chance to see the mummy when it goes on display at Penn Museum in February. October 7, - 4:

December 25, Billboard about the Sodder children, who went missing on Christmas Eve, For nearly four decades, anyone driving down Route 16 near Fayetteville, West Virginia, could see a billboard bearing the grainy images of five children, all dark-haired and solemn-eyed, their names and ages—Maurice, 14; Martha 12; Louis, 9; Jennie, 8; Betty, 5—stenciled beneath, along with speculation about what happened to them. What everyone knew for certain was this: On the night before Christmas, George and Jennie Sodder and nine of their 10 children went to sleep one son was away in the Army. George and Jennie and four of their children escaped, but the other five were never seen again. George had tried to save them, breaking a window to re-enter the house, slicing a swath of skin from his arm. He could see nothing through the smoke and fire, which had swept through all of the downstairs rooms: He took frantic stock of what he knew: He figured Maurice, Martha, Louis, Jennie and Betty still had to be up there, cowering in two bedrooms on either end of the hallway, separated by a staircase that was now engulfed in flames. He raced back outside, hoping to reach them through the upstairs windows, but the ladder he always kept propped against the house was strangely missing. He would drive one of his two coal trucks up to the house and climb atop it to reach the windows. He ransacked his mind for another option. He tried to scoop water from a rain barrel but found it frozen solid. Five of his children were stuck somewhere inside those great, whipping ropes of smoke. A neighbor who saw the blaze made a call from a nearby tavern, but again no operator responded. Exasperated, the neighbor drove into town and tracked down Fire Chief F. George and Jeannie assumed that five of their children were dead, but a brief search of the grounds on Christmas Day turned up no trace of remains. Chief Morris suggested that the blaze had been hot enough to completely cremate the bodies. A state police inspector combed the rubble and attributed the fire to faulty wiring. George covered the basement with five feet of dirt, intending to preserve the site as a memorial. The missing Sodder children. Maurice, Martha, Louis, Jennie, Betty. An older brother who had accompanied him to Ellis Island immediately returned to Italy, leaving George on his own. He found work on the Pennsylvania railroads, carrying water and supplies to the laborers, and after a few years moved to Smithers, West Virginia. Smart and ambitious, he first worked as a driver and then launched his own trucking company, hauling dirt for construction and later freight and coal. They married and had 10 children between and, and settled in Fayetteville, West Virginia, an Appalachian town with a small but active Italian immigrant community. He never explained what had happened back in Italy to make him want to leave. The Sodders planted flowers across the space where their house had stood and began to stitch together a series of odd moments leading up to the fire. There was a stranger who appeared at the home a few months earlier, back in the fall, asking about hauling work. Around the same time, another man tried to sell the family life insurance and became irate when George declined. You are going to be paid for the dirty remarks you have been making about Mussolini. The older Sodder sons also recalled something peculiar: Just before Christmas, they noticed a man parked along U. Highway 21, intently watching the younger kids as they came home from school. Jennie rushed to answer it. An unfamiliar female voice asked for an unfamiliar name. There was raucous laughter and glasses clinking in the background. Tiptoeing back to bed, she noticed that all of the downstairs lights were still on and the curtains open. The front door was unlocked. She saw Marion asleep on the sofa in the living room and assumed that the other kids were upstairs in bed. She turned out the lights, closed the curtains, locked the door and returned to her room. She had just begun to doze when she heard one sharp, loud bang on the roof, and then a rolling noise. An hour later she was roused once again, this time by heavy smoke curling into her room. Jennie Sodder holding John, her first child. Courtesy of Jennie Henthorn. She conducted a private experiment, burning animal bones—chicken bones, beef joints, pork chop bones—to see if the fire consumed them. Each time she was left with a heap of charred bones. She knew that remnants of various household appliances had been found in the burned-out basement, still identifiable. An employee at a crematorium informed her that bones remain after bodies are burned for two hours at 2, degrees. Their house was destroyed in 45 minutes. The collection of odd moments grew. A telephone repair man told the Sodders that their lines appeared to have been cut, not burned. One day, while the family was visiting the site, Sylvia found a hard rubber object in the yard. Jennie recalled hearing the hard thud on the roof, the rolling sound. Then came the reports of sightings. A woman claimed to have seen the missing children peering from a passing car while the fire was in progress. A woman operating a tourist stop between Fayetteville and Charleston, some 50 miles west, said she saw the children the morning after the fire. However, the entire party did register at the hotel and stayed in a large room with several beds. They registered about midnight. I tried to talk to the children in a friendly manner, but the men appeared hostile and refused to allow me to talk to these children. One of the men looked at me in a hostile manner; he turned around and began talking rapidly in Italian. Immediately, the whole party stopped talking to me. I sensed that I was being frozen out and so I said nothing more. They left early the next morning. Next the Sodders turned to a private investigator named C. He also heard a curious story from a Fayetteville minister about F. Morris, the fire chief. He hid it inside a dynamite box and buried it at the scene. Tinsley persuaded Morris to show them the spot. Soon afterward, the Sodders heard rumors that the fire chief had told others that the contents of the box had not been found in the fire at all, that he had buried the beef liver in the rubble in the hope that finding any remains would placate the family enough to stop the investigation. Over the next few years the tips and leads continued to come. George saw a newspaper photo of schoolchildren in New York City and was convinced that one of them was his daughter Betty. He drove to Manhattan in search of the child, but her parents refused to speak to him. In August, the Sodders decided to mount a new search at the fire scene and brought in a Washington, D. The excavation was thorough, uncovering several small objects: Hunter sent the bones to the Smithsonian Institution, which issued the following report: The human bones consist of four lumbar vertebrae belonging to one individual. Since the transverse recesses are fused, the age of this individual at death should have been 16 or 17 years. The top limit of age should be about 22 since the centra, which normally fuse at 23, are still unfused. On this basis, the bones show greater skeletal maturation than one would expect for a year-old boy the oldest missing Sodder child. Flyer about the Sodder children. Patterson and State Police Superintendent W. A letter arrived from a woman in St. Louis saying the oldest girl, Martha, was in a convent there. Another tip came from Texas, where a patron in a bar overheard an incriminating conversation about a long-ago Christmas Eve fire in West Virginia. George traveled the country to investigate each lead, always returning home without any answers. In, more than 20 years after the fire, Jennie went to get the mail and found an envelope addressed only to her. It was postmarked in Kentucky but had no return address. Inside was a photo of a man in his mids. On its flip side a cryptic handwritten note read: I love brother Frankie. Beyond the obvious similarities—dark curly hair, dark brown eyes—they had the same straight, strong nose, the same upward tilt of the left eyebrow. Once again they hired a private detective and sent him to Kentucky. They never heard from him again. Alleged photo of an older Louis Sodder. The Sodders feared that if they published the letter or the name of the town on the postmark they might harm their son. Instead, they amended the billboard to include the updated image of Louis and hung an enlarged version over the fireplace. If they did die in the fire, we want to be convinced. Otherwise, we want to know what happened to them.

6: Mystery Illness Causing Paralysis in Children Baffles Doctors

Mystery as four ancient child graves are uncovered in Egypt - with one having suffered 'severe injuries' Archaeologists discovered four child burials at the ancient quarry site in Egypt.

Von Einem has refused to co-operate with investigators about his possible connection with other murders. During the investigation into von Einem, police heard from an informant identified only as "Mr B". There were enough plausible details to warrant further research, yet other details relayed by Mr B did not fit with known facts and were regarded with skepticism by police. As of [update] , von Einem had not been ruled out as a suspect. Another important distinction is that von Einem was convicted of murdering a 15 year old and suspected of killing men in their teens and twenties; victims older than the Beaumont children and the children who were abducted from the Adelaide Oval. Such disparities amongst victims of a serial killer are not unheard of, but unusual. Von Einem also told the witness that he had taken two girls from the Adelaide Oval during a football match. He said he had killed them but did not elaborate. However, von Einem matches the police sketches of the suspect in both the Beaumont and Adelaide Oval cases [44] and in , he was identified as a suspect in a confidential police report. Then 86, he was charged with the murders of sisters Judith aged 7 and Susan aged 5 Mackay in Townsville , Queensland. They disappeared while on their way to school on 26 August , and their bodies were found several days later in a dry creek bed. Both girls had been strangled. Brown died in Along with von Einem, he is considered to be the best suspect for the Beaumont children abduction as he bore a striking similarity to an identikit picture of the suspect for both the Beaumont children and Adelaide Oval cases. A search for a connection to the Beaumonts was unsuccessful as no employment records existed that could shed light on his movements at the time. Some of the records were believed lost in the Brisbane flood and it is also possible that Brown, who had unrestricted access to government buildings, may have deleted his own files. Brown is considered a suspect for the Beaumont children disappearance, based on the connections that have been made between him and the Adelaide Oval abduction. Although there is no proof that he had ever visited Adelaide, a witness recalled having a conversation with Brown in which he mentioned having seen the Adelaide Festival Centre nearing completion which places him in Adelaide in June The Oval abduction occurred on 25 August However, no evidence has ever been found to connect Brown with Adelaide in when the Beaumont children were abducted. The woman who identified the abductor as Brown first saw him for a single minute when aged 14, and then identified him as Brown 25 years later when she saw him as an year-old on television. Additionally, she had reported that the man was wearing a pair of horn rimmed glasses and Brown is known to have worn horn rimmed glasses, something considered by police to be another noteworthy point in the identification. I was in Melbourne at that time. The Age alleged that evidence gathered by cold-case investigators indicated that he was a likely suspect for a number of unsolved child murders, including the Beaumont children. His insanity plea in the Tuohy murder was at least partly based on his suffering a psychological condition that could prevent him remembering details of his actions. He was supposed to have indicated that he believed he might have killed the Beaumont children, as he was in the area at the time, but he had no recollection of actually doing so. Alan Anthony Munro[edit] In a man, Allan Macintyre, who had himself been investigated by police and cleared of involvement in the Beaumont case, claimed in a newspaper interview that a man he had known in , who by was being sought in Southeast Asia in connection with child abuse incidents there, had according to his children come to his home with the bodies of the Beaumont children in his car. Munro was convicted of abusing several children including a son of Macintyre, [4] who was a contributor to the diary. Munro had been previously investigated by police but no evidence had been found that he was involved in the Beaumont case. Uncovering the Mystery of the Missing Beaumont Children in Animal bones and general rubbish were found, but nothing related to the Beaumont case. Disappearance of Joanne Ratcliffe and Kirste Gordon In , two children, Joanne Ratcliffe aged 11 and Kirste Gordon aged 4 , disappeared from the Adelaide Oval during a football match, and they are presumed to have been abducted and murdered. They were seen several times in the 90 minutes after leaving the Oval, apparently distressed and in the company of an unknown man, but they vanished after the last reported sighting. The Family Murders In , the body of a young man was found in Adelaide. He was identified as Neil Muir aged His body was badly mutilated. In , the mutilated body of Mark Langley aged 18 was found. Before his death, he had been subjected to "surgery" – his abdomen had been sliced open, and had been shaved prior to this. Part of his bowel had been removed and Langley had died from loss of blood. Over the next few months more bodies were found. The dismembered skeletal remains of Peter Stogneff aged 14 were found almost a year after his disappearance and Alan Barnes aged 18 was found mutilated in a similar manner to Langley. A fifth victim, Richard Kelvin aged 15 , was found in , once again with the same mutilations. However, the prosecution was forced to enter a nolle prosequi unwilling to pursue when crucial evidence was deemed inadmissible. These crimes have been known collectively as the Family Murders ; police believe that a core group of four people and up to eight associates were involved in the murders. New leads and clues are regularly reported by the media and the case still regularly headlines print and broadcast media more that half a century on. They remained at their Somerton Park home, and Nancy Beaumont in particular held hope that the children would return and stated in interviews that it would be "dreadful" if the children returned home and did not find their parents waiting for them. They were devastated in when newspapers published computer-generated photographs of how the children would have looked as adults. The pictures, published against their wishes, caused a huge backlash of public sympathy from a community which is still sensitive to their pain. One day, years ago, when I was the director of a preschool, I walked in from the playground with a group of three-year-old children. Here are a few: Maybe one came in and brought it. What other ideas did they have? During our lovely conversation, I wrote down their ideas and explanations. I suggested that we keep thinking, investigate and try out some experiments to solve the mystery of the leaf finding its way indoors. They liked that plan. It is the process of thinking, questioning, and wondering that matters. Solving the problem or answering the question was not nearly as important to those children as asking the question and continuing to pursue the mystery. They did not want to solve it right then and there. They were too invested in continuing this adventure with me and with their classmates. It was the process and the mystery that mattered. However, it is important to recognize that process reigns supreme in most of what children do. When children are interested or intrigued by an object or an idea a puddle, a leaf on a sock they need to dig deep and explore. When they are instead urged to complete a product, craft, or a task around that interest, all of the intellectual intensity is denied them. It is the intellectual intensity that children exhibit in their desire to figure things out, to be pulled into conversations, and to be taken seriously. Take time to listen. Young children have a way of combining fact, fantasy, and imagination in order to make sense of things and to create, what is for them, a logical explanation. How It Drives Science. As you work with these wildly exuberant and curious children, keep in mind that mystery heightens curiosity and teachers are crucial players in creating places where children and adults can pursue these mysteries together. At some point, adults can help children test out their theories related to their mysteries and questions. But be prepared—“young children may want to stick with the mystery and keep up the pursuit, rather than resolve it once and for all.

Initially, Jayne comes up against a series of dead ends that cast doubt on whether the truth will ever be known. I have to say it sickened me to think that those in charge seek to justify their treatment of the children in the name of religious principles. What deity would condone the separation of children from families and a life of such mistreatment? Amongst the many shocking facts revealed is that not all the children are orphans. Many are merely illegitimate, a legacy of snatched moments of happiness during time of war. Heartbreakingly, most of the children are unaware of just how their lives will be affected and that what awaits them is treatment that is unfeeling, sadistic and, in some cases, abusive in nature. In case you are thinking this book sounds simply too depressing for you, let me reassure you there are uplifting moments that will restore your faith in human nature. For example, the children are pathetically grateful for the small acts of kindness from ordinary people they encounter. Harry and the other children are amazingly resilient and form a close bond that sees them look out for one another as best they can. Is there a happy ending? In places this book was hard to read. Even more so as it does touch on the truth. This did really happen and the children were treated like this. Jul 19, Alison rated it really liked it I have been interested in genealogy for quite a few years now so the blurb from this book attracted me. Knowing to a certain degree some of this story actually occurred pulls even more emotion into it. This marks a flaw I have been interested in genealogy for quite a few years now so the blurb from this book attracted me. This marks a flaw in the system that nobody had ever considered. J Lee manages to write this serious subject in a way that makes it easy to read and understandable. A marvellous account of a broken family, trying to find the missing pieces and in all honesty it makes you think that by the grace of god it could have been any child in that period. Talk about in the wrong place at the wrong time. My thanks to the author, publisher and Rachel from Random Resources for my copy. I read and reviewed voluntarily. In this book Jayne tries to find a long-lost brother of her stepmother Vera. The search for Harry takes Jayne on an epic journey which stretches across the world and uncovers betrayal, abuse and tragedy. The story keeps you gripped from beginning to end and the authors style of writing is easy to read. I love each new instalment of this series to catch up with Jayne and her family. Although this is the fourth book in the series, it could easily be read without having read the earlier books in the series. I love genealogy anyway but this story about child migration to the colonies has touched me deeply. I think, because I was born in myself, it made me realise that, but for an accident of birth, it could have been me. My thanks to TBConFB for this copy and to the author for such a thought provoking and heart This is the third Jayne Sinclair novel I have read and it is a very clear favourite! My thanks to TBConFB for this copy and to the author for such a thought provoking and heart breaking account of a very dark period in our history. Meredith rated it really liked it This was my first read of this series. The book flitted between the present day and then when thousands of children were transported from the UK, often without their parents knowledge or permission, to increase the white population in the colonies of Canada and Australia in particular. The story of the young children forced into orphanages and sent across the world was written extremely well, including the hardships and hypocrisy they faced. There was no false sentimentality, but a sense of This was my first read of this series. There was no false sentimentality, but a sense of the multiple losses and traumas they endured and the ongoing effect this had, both on them and their wider families. In contrast, the writing of the modern day story felt slow and clunky at times. I found it more difficult to engage or empathise with the adult characters in the UK and the dialogue at times felt stilted or lecturing. However, the ending had me intrigued enough that when the fifth book comes out, I will have a little look, to see what happens next to Jayne.

The recently received picture shows a young boy with black marker etched across his mouth and face, as if it had been taped shut. The boy is similar in appearance to one of the youths in a Polaroid found here in that spawned national attention from police and the media. Who are the children in the pictures, are they dead or was it a hoax, and what is the connection to Port St. The children in the picture are believed by some to be two children Tara Calico and Michael Paul Henley reported missing in New Mexico. One letter contained a photo, printed on copy paper, of a young boy with sandy brown hair. The second letter contained an original image of the boy. Joe received a third letter, also postmarked in Albuquerque on Aug. Nugent said investigators as recently as this spring had looked at the case file again, so he immediately made the connection between the latest picture and the Polaroid photo found June 15, , in Port St. A witness at the time noticed the photo on the ground in the parking lot of a convenience store a Junior Food Store at the time, now an Express Lane after a white van, driven by a man with a mustache, thought to be in his 30s, exited the parking lot. Although the witness did not know if the photo dropped from the late s Toyota cargo van, and there remains no substantive proof it did, Nugent said, police staged an unsuccessful road block to intercept the vehicle. Nugent remembers the case causing a stir in Port St. Joe, the region and the country. A mystery lives on Though the Federal Bureau of Investigation never positively identified the young girl and boy in the photo, they were initially thought to be Calico and Henley. Calico, then 19, was last seen on the morning of Sept. Henley, 9, also of New Mexico, disappeared in April , while hunting with his father in the Zuni Mountains in northwestern New Mexico. With the arrival of the Internet era, the mystery not only has lived on, it has become the subject of numerous discussion boards and Web sites, particularly as it relates to Calico. There even is a Wikipedia page dedicated to Calico and this case. A woman claimed she had been having visions about the case over the years and said she believed Calico to be buried in California. Nugent said the woman related that she worked with a runaway in a strip club in California and that the runaway was later reported murdered and buried. Nugent said the woman described seeing a light blue Oldsmobile car and the name of Tara Calico in a vivid dream she has had over the years. All the letters have been placed in evidence bags and have been sent to the Florida Department of Law Enforcement lab in Pensacola where they will be submitted to testing for fingerprints and DNA. The FBI is not involved in the latest development. Nugent said those tests likely will take at least a month and any new evidence gleaned from the letters would be passed on to New Mexico authorities where the case of the missing children remains open.
