Professor Infanti has published numerous articles and book chapters in these areas. A Matter of Perspective Ashgate Publishing. Professor Infanti recently completed two book projects. The most recent project is Our Selfish Tax Laws: This project uses comparative legal research to show how tax law is shaped by its social, political, and cultural context. Shaped as it is in this way, the U. Our tax laws are a reflection of ourselves of our society as it is and as we wish it would be. The other project is *Feminist Judgments: In keeping with the theme of this series, Feminist Judgments: Rewritten Tax Opinions aims to demonstrate the transformative potential of feminist analysis for tax law. Tax law is, of course, primarily statutory in nature; however, tax statutes are rarely determinative on their own and require interpretation and application that is often influenced by the context in which the parties and the court are operating. One of the underlying claims of this book is that perspective matters in all areas of judicial interpretation, not only with respect to constitutional questions. The book demonstrates that judges may decide tax issues involving both fundamental constitutional principles, such as equal protection, as well as more prosaic statutes in ways that are consistent with their judicial roles and established methods of interpretation while applying feminist perspectives to advance the goal of equal justice. The book also combats the notion that tax law is a pseudoscientific subdiscipline of economics in which application of the law is foreordained by economic principles or precepts. Instead, the book shows that tax law is a product of the larger social, political, and cultural context in which it operates and that tax law decisions are contingent and that the history and development of tax law can take and could have taken a multiplicity of different paths. Professor Infanti is currently working on another project that is tentatively titled Tax Time: The In justice of Unleashed Legal Imagination. This project adds to a burgeoning literature exploring the relationship between law and time. It shows how, far from being rigidly bound by accepted notions of linear time, tax law unleashes the power of the legal imagination in its conceptualization, application, and manipulation of time. Recognizing that the relationship between tax and time is created rather than dictated, this project calls into question how the tax imagination has been deployed in relationship to time whether for the ends of justice or to simply reify injustice.*
