All the high school kids of the township would go to school in the Walton building, and all the grade school kids would report to the Onward school. Citing a study, Turner said this plan would save the township $20, and give all the kids a better education.

Photo from Life Magazine In the summer of , Township Trustee Virgil Turner announced that the high schools of the towns of Onward, population , and Walton, population , would be consolidated beginning in September. All the high school kids of the township would go to school in the Walton building, and all the grade school kids would report to the Onward school. Trouble was, Onward and Walton were connected by more than just three and a half miles of county road. They were connected by a half-century of tradition and basketball rivalry. Onward had sent boys to two wars during that time, but there was no way they were going to surrender their high school. On September 5, when school started, the Walton grade schoolers went peaceably to Onward, but the Onward teenagers refused to report to Walton, all except seven apostates. Ruefully, Onward principal William Helms reported that two of the seven defectors were boys that could have helped the basketball team. The Onward school year began with the brightest students as teachers. Fearing that trustee Turner would try to take their school by force, the Onward citizens set up a defense brigade. They formed a twenty-four-hour sentry, men and women, in front of the school, and set up an air raid siren to alert the community in case of a night strike. In daylight hours, a small plane scouted the road between the towns. On October 6, Turner rented a truck for a dollar, rounded up fifteen volunteers and loaded up the grade school desks from Walton. His intent was to exchange them for the high school desks still at Onward. Tensely, they began the drive to Onward. They were detected en route, and someone set the siren off. When the school came into sight, fifty men stood in front of it. Heated words were exchanged, then fists flew. Turner and his men retreated, as the Onward residents sang "Onward, Christian Soldiers. Onward, too, was better prepared, having formed two rings of trucks around the building, chained the doors and stationed fifty kids inside. Again there was shoving, and again, this time on orders from Governor Henry Schricker to avoid bloodshed, they retreated. The state switched to a strategy of attrition. Teachers were not paid. State aid payments ceased. Onward kept a wildcat school alive for nearly two years, financing it mainly through chicken dinners which drew supporters from Peru, Logansport and Kokomo. What hurt the people of Onward, maybe more than the loss of their school, was the realization that their small town was no longer autonomous. They had accepted money from the State Board of Education, and now they were paying the price. They were fighting for their independence. In the Indiana legislature had passed a resolution condemning all forms of federal aid. In President Eisenhower, knowing Hoosiers love a good road, came up with a real soft deal: Lose your high school, lose your basketball team, and you lose your identity. For a small town, to consolidate was to be erased.

It is simple, fun, and not a scary! I have young children and I love when we go to a house that has kid friendly Halloween decorations. Another thing I love about this is that you can have this doormat if you live in a house, apartment, condo, town home, tent, heck even an igloo. I will first include the tutorial of how to make the BOO! At the end of the post I will include the free BOO! It is a craft knife to make cutting out letters so easily. This printable includes 4 pages. Each letter will cover an 8. See picture below for details. This doormat took me only took me 2 simple steps and it was under 5 minutes. First, cut out your BOO! Paint the letters on and let it dry. It only took me one layer of paint on this type of rug. Not the actual letter. I put polka dots on my letter because I love polka dots! The best things came into my life when these Doppler paint brushes were invented. They make the perfect polka dot! They are something I have always needed because I can never get a perfect dot. The best part about these dopplers is the price. It is so simple. Put the witch legs under the doormat and your witch doormat is done! You can either leave your witch doormat plain, or add the BOO! Here is the BOO! One on each page, including the exclamation mark.
