getAbstract categorically recommends this book to anyone - entrepreneur or not - whose life could benefit from considering a cat's worldview, including being curious, acting instinctively, grooming carefully, hunting persistently and keeping a watchful eye on both the mice and the dogs.

And its been all my fault. Works great for some things, but not business. Roofers, remodelers, you get the idea. I bought courses some expensive to learn the process and I actually ended up doing some low cost work for a few contractors - building web sites and doing Adwords. Most contractors at least those in my area are booked months out. I chose the wrong vertical. This thread is something to track my progress as I completely "shift gears" and move into something non-techy. About 10 days ago I started looking into cleaning out our garage and I needed extra storage. Then my analytical wheels started turning. I placed an ad in my local area and to my surprise I got about 1 response every other day from potential customers. So now I am pursuing this opportunity, but I have to work through a few challenges that include: A single meeting that I had today solved all of these issues at once. We had a new deck put in two years ago. Today he solved all my problems. His problem is solved. For now the one single most important thing I have to do is contact the people that were interested earlier and make a sale. Once I do that we can go through the building processes and see how things go. Website, Adwords, Google Maps, etc. As one ex IT guy who now does Google Ads to another Help one person at a time, and always start with the person nearest you.
