Additional Information In lieu of an abstract, here is a brief excerpt of the content: One of the signature characteristics of the layouts of Demeter sanctuaries outside the region is their heterogeneity and evident lack of standardiza White , 20; White , 85; White , xxviâ€”xxx. The subject of an exhaustive and useful survey by Susan Cole for which see Cole , 6” Those small and inconspicuous rural shrines which dot the Greek landscape from Sicily to the mainland, the islands, and beyond are often as not located on hillsides; they can occupy sites near caves, springs often mineral-charged or thermally active , and other distinctive tellurian features, while others simply spring up in an open field. Their identifications frequently depend more on what they contain in the form of votive caches than anything particularly distinctive about their layouts. The urban house sanctuary type, best exemplified by those found at Morgantina, would be hard to identify as much more than domestic residences if they had not possessed accumulations of characteristic Demeter terracotta votive offerings alongside of altars, bothroi, and offering benches. Bell , 56; Bell , passim; Sposito , 33, passim. For Camarina see Di Stefano , 71, passim. The large, sprawling compound Sanctuary of the Chthonian Deities placed inside the protective line of the city walls of Acragas avoids rising ground. Gruben , 35, pl. Some form of temenos wall seems likely but barely substantiated by the archaeological remains. Hinz , 71, fig. It presumably owes its accretive and distinctively original plan to the fact that it was called upon to service over time a number of pre-Greek deities affiliated with Demeter and the Kore and in the process underwent an extended development beginning in the Archaic period. Construction was started on two temples that were abandoned before completion. Two additional temples, whose identities after many years still remain problematic, eventually were completed and must have been associated on some level with the principal Hellenic twin goddesses in residence.
