The fiery dragon!" And they swept across the field and into the gate of the town, and the Princess heard the gate bang, and the children were out of sight-but on the other side of the field the rose-thorns crackled and smashed in the hedge, and something very large and glaring and horrible trampled the ferns in the ditch for one moment before it hid itself again in the covert of the wood.

The woman, the dragon, and the child – Revelation There was a great fiery red dragon having seven heads and 10 horns, and on his heads were seven diadems. And the dragon stood in front of the woman who was about to give birth, so that when she did give birth he might devour her child. There is widespread agreement among Bible scholars that John is gazing at Satan. First, we must ask why he is depicted as a fiery red dragon. You crushed Rahab like one who is slain; You scattered Your enemies with Your powerful arm. Scripture sometimes uses this name to describe Egypt; see Isa. By His breath the heavens gained their beauty; His hand pierced the fleeing serpent. Ezekiel describes Egypt and her pharaohs as monsters of the seas Eze. Jeremiah compares the king of Babylon to a dragon, or sea monster Jer. But the dragon image is most fully developed in Revelation. Revelation explicitly identifies the dragon with Satan, the archenemy of God and his people. As God defeated the beast from the sea in Daniel and the dragon of Egypt through the Exodus, so he will defeat Satan Rev. In the new heaven and earth there will no longer be a sea The color red is associated with death Rev. Seven heads, 10 horns Next, John describes the dragon as having seven heads and 10 horns, and on his heads are seven diadems, or kingly crowns. Satan is the great counterfeit, and seven is the number of spiritual perfection. The number seven appears times in verses in scripture HCSB , and often it is associated with God. He rests on the seventh day of creation; marks off the week of seven days; makes a seven-fold promise to Abraham and a seven-fold covenant with Israel; is depicted as seven spirits; addresses seven churches in Asia Minor; pours out his judgment in seven seals, seven trumpets, and seven bowls. Much more could be written about the significance of the number seven and its place in depicting the completeness and satisfaction to be found in God. So why would Satan choose any other number in his efforts to deceive the nations? In Revelation 13, a beast emerges from the sea with seven heads and 10 horns. While commentators differ as to the meaning of all this, one thing is clear: Satan is in the midst of human events, a crowned monarch doing his best to keep his doomed kingdom intact. In Matthew 12, Jesus refers to Satan as a king with a kingdom. Three times in the Gospel of John, our Lord refers to Satan as the prince of this world. And in Ephesians 2, Paul refers to him as the prince of the power of the air. In the temptation of Jesus, Satan takes Him to a high mountain and shows Him all the kingdoms of the world. And in 1 John 5, John says the whole world lies in the hands of the wicked one. Worldly kings and kingdoms rise, and even those who are hand-picked for blessing by God end up pushing Him aside as they are lifted up with pride. Behind these puppet kings, the fiery red dragon pulls the strings. It is his world until the sounding of the seventh trumpet Rev. When does this happen? And who are the stars? Some interpreters believe the stars are Christian leaders whom Satan deceives, resulting in an apostate church. His tail – his influence and power – stretches from the gates of heaven to the depths of the sea. Utley provides a much-needed word of caution here: In apocalyptic literature the central theme of the vision is crucial, but the literalness of the presentation, the details and the images are dramatic, symbolic, fictional. It is our curiosity and respect for the Bible that motivate our detailed, logical doctrinal formulations. Be careful of pushing the details; apocalyptic literature is often true theology presented in an imaginative frame-work. Revelation, Study Guide Commentary Series, pp. We have determined that the woman is Israel, and most commentators readily agree that the child is Jesus, the Messiah. The Messiah defeats Satan through His incarnation God taking on flesh and partaking in the human experience – John 1: Through all this, Jesus also defeated the works of the Devil 1 John 3: All efforts having failed, Satan now positions himself in front of Israel so that when Mary delivers Jesus – a vulnerable child in the hands of a poor Jewish couple – he might devour the Son of God as He breathes His first air. Joseph escapes with Mary and Jesus to Egypt see Matt. The Son is born, protected, and safe. Satan will have future encounters with Jesus – the wilderness temptations, for example – but the Son of Man emerges victorious in all things. The male child knows His purpose in coming to earth. He comes to seek and to save the lost Luke In essence, Jesus and Satan have diametrically opposed purposes and yet share a common means: Satan seeks to kill Jesus and thus devour Him. Jesus seeks to be killed in order to deliver sinful people from the wages of sin â€” death and hell. Satan is shut out of the redemptive work of the Godhead. She gave birth to a Son â€” Revelation

The Fiery Dragon is a creature made of Hell Fire that appears at the end of the Haunted Mansion film. It comes to take Ramsley to Hell after the truth of his murder of Elizabeth, his treachery against his master and his blackmailing the other residents of the Mansion was revealed.

Beware the Fiery Dragon! January 18, By Nicholas A few days ago, I checked the weather for the week. Today in Jordanville it was supposed to be in the forties and raining. But when I woke up, it was 3 degrees Fahrenheit. Today, as the weatherman should have known, is the day before Theophany, or the celebration of the baptism of Christ. Today and tomorrow are supposed to be the coldest days of the year, according to Russian folk belief. The first response to this is defiance. Every self-respecting Russian muzhik would bathe in freezing water on this night. However, Russians still feared for their spiritual lives on this night. They made sure to draw crosses in chalk on their doors before the night came. If you forget to do this, even if you live in the big city, not the village, then you should expect something terrible in the night. The Fiery Dragon Of all the possible forms evil takes, this night, it takes its most terrifying form of all: He flies over the villages, looking for a safe place to land. Then he explodes in a shower of sparks over the deep snows covering Mother Earth. But what does he look like, exactly? Local custom in Tula is very specific, taking as their cue the frequent shape-shifting abilities that the devil exhibits in the lives of saints. He has no mercy. A single touch means death. And what can you expect from the dark powers? You might think he has no reason to go flying about this night, but we know that he likes to visit the young ladies. Everyone knows that if he falls in love with one of the girls, then her affliction will never heal. Everyone can see how the Fiery Dragon flies in the air and burns with an unquenchable fire. But not everyone knows that as soon as he comes down the chimney, he becomes a youth of indescribable beauty. In fact, one of the most famous villains in all Russian folk tales is Zmei Gorynich, who is a fire-breathing dragon with several heads. Even more interesting is the proposed remedy for the visit of such a dangerous, enticing shape-shifter: This snow is generally considered to be endowed with special significance. You can also put a bit of this snow in your well. How Medieval Moscow celebrated Theophany Of course, in the cities, such customs were less pervasive. The feast of Theophany was instead a day of especial pomp and circumstance. The Tsar himself would come out for the feast, and nearly every nobleman, even from the farthest places, made sure to come to the Kremlin. It was a rare chance for lesser nobles to actually see the face of their distant and severe ruler. The rite of sanctification of the waters was performed by the Patriarch himself at the Moscow River. For this service, upward of four or five thousand people would attend. Ivan Tsarevich in a feriaz The actual service of blessing the water is basically the same as it is done today. After it ended, the whole crowd would walk back to the cathedral. After the Tsar returned to his palace, the rest of Moscow began its last, wild celebration of the Sviatky, the holy days between Christmas and Epiphany. Nobles sat down to elaborate feasts, young people sang and danced in the streets until early morning. After all, Lent is just around the corner! I even remember being mad when it took best special effects at the Oscars. That year was also the Phantom Menace, and although you had a very shitty movie, the special effects shots it mustered, at the time, was an outstanding feat of movie making. In fact, so complete was my disdain that I was verbally writing the films off to other people without actually having seen them. A big no-no for my personal nerd code, or maybe that was a dark time for me—maybe not a great year personally—and thus I was sufficiently distracted and pissy as to forget the wonder of nerdery for a time—Who needs a light saber when you have a katana? Then, at the beginning of summer the clouds were lifting and I decided to spend my vacation catching up on a few things. The first of them was Blackhawk Down. Oh boy did that movie hit me hard. I actually found myself, a self-described movie guru, breathing hard during the parts where I supposed to breathe hard. It had been a long time that I had experienced total film immersion—maybe not since Saving Private Ryan? Then, just two days later, I was sitting in front of Matrix Revolutions, yes, the 3rd film in the series and inexplicably feeling that same film immersion thing happening again. So much great stuff that had been visually accomplished before in comics was suddenly swirling around seamlessly in some very detailed special effects—worthy of Oscar level accolades—and making me laugh out loud. It took me back to my very young days of playing with my Micronauts, x-wing fighters and Lego robo-men. It was a trip. Reloaded was watched almost immediately after, and then the 1st Matrix for good measure, and thus completed a reverse trilogy watch, which was a first for me. The Matrix films had become a secret pleasure, seeing as I had mouthed them to friends so often before, again, without reason. Yes, like most predators, nerds hunt in packs as well. In time, I had concluded that within the trilogy resided some pretty awesome, well executed ideas. It shocks me to think that with so much not so great sci-fi stuff out there, the Star Wars prequels being the extreme side of that scale, that somehow The Matrix trilogy would find itself left out in the cold reaches of nerd space garbage. I love this one. Somewhere good and early into Reloaded there is a meeting between the crews of 3 ships. At this meeting it is made known that the big bad machines are beginning to burrow their way to the human home city of Zion in order to destroy it. The ships, their crews, the people of Zion, their leaders, and the specific personalities they call heroes all work towards the goal of human preservation. They spend the rest of both movies trying to destroy humanity. Along the way we learn of things like faith, and love, and causality. We also watch character growth, in Neo, Morpheus, and just about everyone else in the movie. These are all signs of plot. Moreover, The Matrix is about Neo, the coming of a Messiah like figure. Reloaded is about love and faith. Remind you of anything? Primarily, that Neo finishes the first film as a God within The Matrix. Kinda like what Naome Campbell does with hotel maids. But this is not what happened. Strange—you knew that I was trying to punch you—This whole sequence has angered fans. I guess because the idea of a sequel angers them altogether. To see him not being able to destroy things with but a twinkle of his nose is no fun, and anything less is beneath the character. Therefore, the idea of everything getting stronger, or upgrading, is just a stooooopid device to give Neo a reason to punch again. Ergo, the movie sucks. The destruction of Zion is. The Matrix is essentially a video game where anything can happen, so the god-like Neo is as only as god-like as it allows. The Matrix dictates the rules, Neo, Morpheus and the Agents are just really good at bending them. Upgrades, scudgrages you say? The whole crux of the problem for the humans in The Matrix is that they perfected making machines so well that those very same machines became self-aware. Since they became self-aware, they suddenly developed the drive for self-preservation. When the dust had settled nothing had changed really—only that now the humans were the slaves and the machines were the masters. In reaction to this, machines by way of this oppression do what they were destined to do and self-actualize. Since nobody enjoys being a slave, they rise up and turn the tables on Humans. In time, they oppress humans and make them the slaves. Neo is the result of a continuation of the pattern. That being, a human self-actualizing as a machine and rising up against their machine oppressor. So yeah, at some point, as a human, he should be able to blow up machines by just thinking about it. In the actual Matrix, by the end of Revolutions, he has to do it Jedi style with Smith and go to the light sabers so-to-speak. To really drive the point home on the whole yin-yang thang, Smith actually possesses a human as a machine vs. Neo who can possess machines as a human. Hammered by most nerd commentary, the dance cave scene seems to almost spoil the movie out right for them. Love it or leave it, the dance cave scene simply establishes that there is life loving humanity in Zion " which is why Zion must be saved. Before the big party, Morpheus, like any spiritual leader, stands before the people and delivers a message of strength and hope. With the exception of the girl in the red dress, and Trinity in a muscle shirt, this is the first time there is sex introduced into the Matrix story. Oh yeah, and candles. Caves, sweat, music, dancing, sex and candles. Yes nerds, they all go together. Clearly, by comparison, Nerds have the party thing under control. Betrayed with a Kiss: First off, how could what is essentially a computer program, feel and act on a thing such as jealousy? These are great questions. The answer is a simple one. They have become just as petty and insecure, secretive and arrogant. This is reflected in the relationship of Persephone and the Merovingian. There shall be no icky kissing in Science Fiction. And" Once more, the movie does a pretty good job of explaining this. At the beginning of Revolutions, when Neo is stuck in the subway he is kept company by Rama Khandra and his family. Although this may not directly translate to the power of love that Neo feels for Trinity, to a machine, their idea of love is good enough. Whereas we see a dependable connection between Khandra and his wife, we do not see this in Persephone and the Merovingian. A way of saying that machines suck at relationships as much as humans do. More importantly, I think what the real message in all of this is that love is so important to being human that even something as unfeeling as a machine learns to need it as much as anything else. Made fun of time and time and time again. Yes, I did like this scene. Many, many nerds thought this a huge disappointment. I on the other hand immediately thought of the Wizard of Oz. Think about that for a few seconds. No, but what the Architect is saying is that getting to him is supposed to be the end to the story. This is actually a pretty cool plot point because now, without all the obvious, we finally get to see just how special Neo is. What the Hell Happened At the End?: And like I mentioned before, I hate anime with an unbridled passion, so since The Matrix had this heavy anime influence, it almost seemed like it was heading right into one of those silly, super contrived, impossible to understand spiritually infused quantum physics style endings that only anime gets a kick out of. There was an explosion that rippled through The Matrix, and then the Oracle was lying in a puddle where Smith used to be " no Neo at all. And thus I figured it had to do with viruses. That is, Smith was essentially a computer virus that was assimilating The Matrix and that Neo was the cure. But in order for the cure to activate, it needs to work from within, and that was only going to happen if Smith assimilated Neo as well. Neo is a virus for the virus. Not only is this a signal to Neo as to what to do next, but it is also letting Neo know that the Oracle is still within in The Matrix, bidding her time, waiting for him to make the final sacrifice. Yet another frustrating criticism when you consider that both Star Wars and Empire Strikes Back " especially Empire Strikes Back " is filled with as much of the same kind of dialogue. Star Wars has to do with fate, destiny and a willingness for self-sacrifice. The Matrix is completely guilty of adopting the same themes. Even more so when you figure how heavily influential Eastern culture is already on The Matrix story as a whole. You have a major character called the Oracle. The movies are also unashamedly chalk full of never-say-die, love-conquers-all, life-is-a-series-of-choices themes that repeat themselves over and over again. Again, no different than Star Wars, The Lord of the Rings, or just about every other morality tale set in desperate times. Do, or do not, there is not try"Also, beer. This is the most tiresome of all the things said about the sequels. Revolutions is widely regarded as having a never ending stream of iconic cyber-punk images and special effects which included, a titanic battle that involved mech-style exoskeleton battle suits a mini-Pacific Rim if you will , a blood rushing ship from squid chase through an impossibly narrow tube network, and a super hero style battle over a cityscape in the rain.
